SIR W. H. FLOWER, president, in the chair.—The report of the council stated that the number of fellows on January 1, 1896, was 3027, showing a net increase of 55 members during the year. The number of new fellows that joined the society in 1895 was 197, which was the largest number of elections that had taken place in any year since 1877. The total receipts of the society for 1895 amounted to £26,958 9s. 1d., showing an increase of £1851 8s. 6d., as compared with the previous year. The ordinary expenditure in 1895 had amounted to £23,460 18s. 10d., being £155 6s. 9d. less than that of the previous year. Besides this a sum of £1649 19s. 1d. had been charged to extraordinary expenditure. Of this sum £1149 19s. 1d. had been devoted to the new scheme of drainage for the society's Gardens, and £500 to the special acquisition of a giraffe for the menagerie. Besides this expenditure, £1000 had been devoted to paying off the last remaining portion of the mortgage debt on the society's freehold premises, which were now valued at £25,000 and were absolutely free and unencumbered. A second sum of £1000 had been transferred to a deposit account. After these payments a balance of £1391 1s. 2d. had been carried forward to the credit of the present year. A new edition of the list of animals in the society's collection, of which the last (the eighth) was published in 1883, had been prepared under the direction of the secretary. It would, it was hoped, be ready for issue before the close of the present year. A large number of accessions to the library were reported. The number of visitors to the Gardens in 1895 had been 665,326, which was greater than it had been in any year during the past ten years. The number of animals in the society's collection on December 31 last was 2369, of which 768 were mammals, 1267 birds, and 334 reptiles. About 23 species of mammals, 22 of birds, and one of reptiles had bred in the Gardens during the summer of 1895.—General the Hon. Sir Percy Feilding, Prof. Alfred Newton, Sir Thomas Paine, Mr. E. Lort Phillips, and Lord Walsingham were elected into the council in the place of the retiring members. Sir W. H. Flower was re-elected president, Mr. Charles Drummond treasurer, and Mr. Philip Lutley Sclater secretary for the ensuing year.

(Tuesday, May 5.)

DR. JOHN ANDERSON, vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. P. L. Sclater, the secretary, read a report on the additions that had been made to the society's Menagerie during the month of April, and called special attention to a young male Indian elephant from Burma, acquired by purchase.—Mr. W. E. Hoyle exhibited a Röntgen-ray photograph of a snake in the act of swallowing a mouse.—Mr. G. A. Boulenger read a paper on some little-known Batrachians from the Caucasus, based chiefly on specimens recently transmitted to the British Museum by Dr. Radde, of Tiflis.—Mr. F. E. Beddard read the second of his contributions to the anatomy of Picarian birds.—Mr. M. F. Woodward read a paper on the dentition of certain Insectivores, and pointed out that there was strong evidence to show that the milk-dentition was undergoing reduction in the group as a whole.—A communication from Mr. A. D. Bartlett contained some notes on the breeding of the Surinam toad (Pipa americana), as recently observed in the society's gardens. It had been observed that the eggs, when issued from the cloaca of the female, which was protruded into a bladder-like process during their production, were arranged on the back of the female by the action of the male.

ELIZABETHAN.—(Wednesday, April 15.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. J. M. Wheeler read a paper on "Marlowe and the Tudor Humanists." The paper went fully into the heresies of the period, the visit of Giordano Bruno to England, and the society of Sir Philip Sidney, Lord Brooke, and others, who discussed with closed doors. Referring to the statement of Greene about a companion of Marlowe in blasphemy who perished miserably, the views were given of four heretics who were burnt at Norwich—Hamont in 1579, Lewis in 1583, Cole in 1587, and Kett in 1589. As a Norwich man Greene would know all these cases. Kett, a fellow of Marlowe's own college and an antitrinitarian mystic, may have given an impulse to heresy; but Marlowe was no follower of Kett. The views attributed to Marlowe by Bame were nearer those of Hamont, but still more pronounced. Bame's document represented information to be proved in a law court.—Mr. Bullen said it was a comfort to know Bame was hanged; but an accident of that kind might happen to any one in those days. Bame was a B.A. of Cambridge, educated at Christ's College at the same time as Marlowe. He probably set down the most offensive things heard from Marlowe's reckless tongue. His charges were the exaggerations, not the inventions, of an enemy. A warrant was out for the arrest of Marlowe when he was killed in a Deptford tavern. This was the bare fact. That it was in a drunken brawl, and that gaming or a lewd love was the occasion, were suggestions of the Puritan mind at the death of an infidel playwright. It was quite possible that Archer was a constable, or that Marlowe, a fugitive, knowing his life was at stake, took his assailant for one who would arrest him, and in the scuffle was killed.—Mr. Wheeler threw out the fancy that something of Marlowe may have been embodied by Shakespeare in his Mercutio, and contended that Sonnet 86 referred to Marlowe and not to George Chapman.—The usual discussion followed.

HELLENIC.—(Monday, May 4.)

PROF. LEWIS CAMPBELL in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. Talfourd Ely on "Newly Discovered Paintings at Pompeii," illustrated by photographs, which were handed round for inspection. The paintings described were of very various degrees of merit, some of them being clearly copies of older originals coming from an Hellenic source. Among the subjects were the strangling of serpents by Hercules, who appears a stalwart boy much older than the traditionally ascribed ten months. There was also a pictorial representation of Hero and Leander; and of the desertion of Ariadne by Theseus there were about twenty-five examples at Herculaneum. A beardless Zeus also was found, of which instances are very rare, though occasional mention of such a form of representation is made in Pausanias. There was one example of Persous and Andromeda, differing from the usual presentation of the latter as chained to a rock. The story of Ixion was curiously of rare occurrence in the remains of ancient art, but at Pompeii was found a picture of the discovery of Ixion by Dionysus, the head of the former being turned the wrong way. Many of the pictures represented different trades, and of these some were of a very commonplace and realistic character. In others the work was represented in a more ideal fashion, through the medium of little Erotes, who were depicted as carrying on the trades of dyeing and fulling, and in another instance in the act of coining money. With the latter examples he proposed to deal in the Numismatic Journal. The effect in some cases was almost comical, as in pictures of oil-making, of a wine shop, and of gymnastic performances. The reader went into considerable detail, much of which was of a technical character.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Wednesday, May 6.)

JUDGE BAYLIS, vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. C. E. Keyser read a second paper on "Recent Discoveries of Mural Paintings at Willingham Church, Cambridgeshire, and elsewhere," the first part of which was read at the Institute on February 5. Before arriving at Willingham the author described some mural paintings found in twenty-seven churches in the counties of Wilts, Berks, Oxford, Bedford, Huntingdon, and Cambridge, many of which were fragmentary. Two, however, deserve special notice: namely, the one at Sonning, in Berkshire, where a late portraiture of St. Christopher was found over the doorway, a unique instance of a painting of the saint in this situation in England; the other in Brightwell Baldwin, in Oxfordshire, where there is an old chest on the front of which is painted the combat between St. George and the Dragon of early fifteenth century date. These painted chests are by no means common, only fifteen having come under the author's notice. Mr. Keyser then fully described the mural paintings at Willingham Church, which have been thoroughly and carefully restored in the last few years. The most important remains are on the walls of the nave, where at least four series of paintings have been brought to light: one relating to the Blessed Virgin, and another to the legend of St. George and the Dragon, also a large portraiture of St. Christopher, where he is represented holding the infant Saviour on his left arm, and not on the shoulder as is almost invariably the case. In the south aisle also considerable remains have been brought to light. Such a record of wall paintings as Mr. Keyser gave is especially noteworthy; for, as he said, his paper in some instances contained the only record of their brief exposure before their final destruction or concealment by a fresh coating of plaster being laid on them—a necessary act due to the imperfect condition of most of the paintings. Mr. Keyser brought photographs of some of the mural paintings for exhibition.—Mr. Green (hon. director), in the absence of the author, read a paper on "Great Stones at Gozo, Malta," explored in 1893 by Dr. A. A. Carnana. These great stones at tal-Qaghan, standing in situ and numbering fifteen, are all that remain of a cyclopean monument forming an enclosure of 1600 square yards; for the author tells how until lately considerable use was made of these stones for building houses and walls in the neighbourhood. In connexion with these remains are three vast natural caverns, probably used as cattle-sheds. Not far off another smaller megalithic enclosure at ta-Mresbiet was also discovered, more regular in form and nearly complete, but of different construction. Plans of these remains were exhibited, also a series of photographs of the stones themselves as shown by Sir Benjamin Stone, who with the Rev. W. K. B. Bedford took part in the discussion that followed, and explained how important it was that Government should take steps to preserve what remains of these ancient and important ruins from the reckless hands of visitors.

FINE ART.

THE EGYPT EXPLORATION FUND.

DEIR EL BAHARI.

Malagay: May 2, 1893.

THE student of Egyptian art, and especially of Egyptian architecture, has now at his disposal on the spot every facility for the study of a monument unique among all those preserved to us in the Valley of the Nile. The temple of Deir el Bahari is completely cleared, and is now free from the last of the rubbish mounds which last year still encumbered its enclosure wall on the south.

Even the casual visitor is immediately struck by the fact that this temple is unlike any other, both in plan and in the details of style adopted in its construction by the architect, Senmut. There is no other Egyptian temple known to us which is built on a rising succession of platforms; and we are therefore without comparisons for our guidance in seeking to ascertain how the architect was led to the adoption of this scheme. To some extent it may have been suggested to him by the nature of the site at his disposal, by the huge steps in which the rock of the foundations descends to the plain. What was the distinctive use of each of the three platforms on which the temple was built? Our excavations have proved that the lowest platform was treated as the garden, or rather the orchard, of the temple, and that the trees planted in it were artificially watered. But the central and most extensive of the platforms, on the one side abutting against the cliffs, and on the other supported by a decorated retaining wall, seems to have been a clear space, and may perhaps be considered as corresponding to the spacious colonnaded courts preceding the sanctuaries in temples of both Pharaohs and Ptolemies. Neither have we any certainty as to the proposed use of the four unfinished chambers opening on to the colonnade on the northern side of the middle platform. Like the lateral chambers at Denderah and Edfu, they may have been intended as store-rooms for the incense and sacred oils, the garments and numerous utensils necessary to performing the various rites of the complicated Egyptian ritual. Or, like the court of the altar of Harmakhis, they may have been sanctuaries dedicated to the cult of divinities more especially worshipped in other parts of Egypt. But the more plausible supposition is that they were meant to be funerary chapels for members of the queen's family.

The above may serve as examples of the many unsolved questions raised by the study of this remarkable building; and the solution of the problems is the more interesting, since Deir el Bahari is the oldest of all the funerary temples in the so-called Memnonia of Thebes.

Again, the similarity of the architecture at Deir el Bahari to that of Greek temples is forced upon us, especially when looking on the white columns of the Anubis Shrine after coming from the Ramesseum. This impression is not only a general one, but is borne out in some detail by a comparison between the fluted columns of Hatshepsu and those of the Doric order, by a consideration of the architectural proportions of this part of the building and the relations between column and architrave. At Deir el Bahari nothing is on a gigantic scale; but it seems to me that when the Egyptians turned aside from the style which was here applied so successfully, in favour of the massive architecture of Karnak and Medinet Habu, they deviated from the path which would have led them to elegance, and preferred the majestic and the colossal.

At the end of last winter, it could indeed be said that the temple was practically cleared. Nevertheless, the excavation was at some point, incomplete; and the work of last season, which has been on a much smaller scale than that of the preceding, has now completed it. Last year the enclosure wall on the south was still encumbered, and the retaining wall of the Hathor Shrine was visible to but half its depth; now the enclosure wall is not only entirely bared, but it is divided by a wide open space from the mounds of rubbish which cover tombs and structures older than the temple of Hatshepsu.

In the course of this year's work we have found many fragments of the famous Punt sculptures, all emphasising the African character of the country in which the expedition landed, but testifying also to the fact that the population of that country was not homogeneous. In addition to the genuine Puntites, with aquiline features, pointed beards, and long hair, there are also represented negroes of two different shades of colour—brown and black. The native huts were apparently made of wickerwork, and in front of one of them sits a big white dog with pendant ears. Another dog of the same kind, and led by a string, is being brought to the Egyptians. Birds with long bills are seen flying out of the trees from which men are gathering the incense, while the nests which they have forsaken are robbed of their eggs either for food or for some religious observance. Unfortunately these precious fragments do not complete the missing scenes, of which the destruction must not be attributed wholly to tourists and antiquity dealers: this work of havoc was begun in ancient times.

The Hathor Shrine projects beyond the southern edge of the middle platform. Parallel to the Shrine a wall branched off at right angles to the enclosure wall forming a small court already destroyed in the time of the XXIst Dynasty. The corner of the wall alone remains. Our excavations in the soil of this court and along the outside of the shrine confirm Mariette's discovery, that the temple was built on the site of a necropolis of the XIth Dynasty. In the immediate vicinity of the temple I came across some dozen tombs, which I thoroughly cleared, finding that, as usual in most Egyptian cemeteries, they had all been anciently rifled. Some had been re-used in the XXIst Dynasty for priests of Amon. But even in a rifled necropolis we may hope to discover occasionally a tomb which was overlooked by the plunderers, and to this end it is necessary that every tomb in the place should be systematically excavated. The tombs at Deir el Bahari are all on the same plan; they are rectangular pits dug in the soft and flaky rock to a depth of ten or twelve feet. On one side, generally on the west, opens a small chamber originally closed by a brick wall, which contained one coffin only. The plundering of these tombs had usually taken place shortly after the burial; and in such cases the rubbish with which they were filled consisted of the rock chips made in the course of cutting out the pit. Several pits, which, judging from the nature of the rubbish which they contained, were apparently untouched, proved to have been completely cleared except for a few wooden figures, or a little coarse pottery. But when a pit contained stones, some of which had obviously been taken from the walls of the temple, there could be no doubt that the tomb had been re-used; and in one case the door had been closed with two or three stone slabs, and the tomb itself contained a yellow mummiform coffin of XXIst Dynasty style.

The interments of the XIth Dynasty were apparently made with a certain amount of luxury, and the tombs originally contained valuables, otherwise they would not have tempted the cupidity of the robbers. I could form some idea as to what the character of this necropolis must once have been from a tomb which had been only partly plundered. In emptying the pit we found two pieces of the gilt case of the inner coffin, and the blue glazed-ware bead necklace of the mummy. The chamber contained a coffin in the style of the XIth Dynasty, made of sycamore wood, rectangular, very thick and heavy, and in a perfect state of preservation. Outside, on box and lid, are lines of blue hieroglyphs giving the name of the deceased, and also there are two large eyes, a decoration characteristic of coffins of that period. The angles are lined with gilding. The inside is entirely covered with paintings and inscriptions. Above are horizontal lines of large hieroglyphs most exquisitely painted, as well as representations of the objects supposed to be placed near the deceased: mirrors, necklaces, bracelets, &c. Below and on the bottom are funerary texts, in a script intermediate between hieratic and hieroglyphic. In the coffin had been left pieces of a very thick cartonnage, entirely gilt, except the necklace, which was painted in colours, and the hair. The mummy must have had jewels, which had been stolen, but the plundering seems to have been done hastily. The sandals and the pillow, both gilt, had been left, as well as many objects which had been deposited near the coffin. These objects are similar to those discovered at Meir in tombs of the VIth Dynasty, but they are of less artistic value. We got out two wooden boats with their crews, in one of which the figure of the deceased is seen sitting under an awning; two models of houses containing numerous figures—one of them emptying bags of corn into a granary; in the other a bull is seen lying on the ground, with his legs tied together while a man cuts his throat with a knife. We also found statuettes of men and women, carrying jars, loaves, and various provisions in baskets. These objects recall some adjuncts of the earthly life of the deceased, and were intended to answer the same purpose as the pictures on the walls of the tombs at Ghizeh and Sakkara. There was hardly a single tomb in which some such model figures had not been dropped. In one they had been jumbled together into a corner with the bricks of the door, in order to make room for the mummy of a priest of Amon, evidently of no high rank, since it was his office to prepare ointments for the use of the high priest.

It is remarkable that this beautiful coffin does not bear the same name inside and outside. Inside the deceased is called Buan. He was a man of high rank with numerous titles, among which are those of Head of the Treasury and Head of the Granaries, showing that his position was one of considerable power. But on the outside he is called simply Menthuhotep, a name probably assumed as being that of the king under whose reign he had spent the greater part of his life, or to whom he was most indebted for the favours which he had received. I take it that the life of Buan-Menthuhotep was contemporary with the end of the XIth Dynasty and the beginning of the XIIth. His coffin, with all its paraphernalia, is now at Ghizeh. In artistic beauty and in preservation it is certainly one of the finest to be found in any museum.

As my work was exclusively directed towards the temple and all that concerned its structure and its history, I did not go out of my way to make further researches in the adjacent XIth Dynasty necropolis. It is a place where interesting and probably fruitful excavations might be made; and I believe that a systematic exploration of the space between the temple and the cliff which bounds the amphitheatre of Deir el Bahari on the south would reveal not only the whole extent of the necropolis, of which we have investigated one outskirt only, but also remains of buildings erected by Antefs and Mentuhoteps, kings whose dates and succession are now the object of much discussion among Egyptologists.

HANNIBAL'S TOMB.

Paris: April 30, 1896.

Having read in the French papers that a German archaeological mission has set out for the Levant in order to explore the environs of the Turkish village of Gebzeh (between Soutari and Nicomedia), believed to be the site of the ancient town of Libyssa, where, according to Livy and others, Hannibal was buried, I was forcibly reminded of the following personal anecdote, bearing in a direct manner upon the object of the mission—namely, the discovery of Hannibal's tomb, or of any remains of it. As a constant reader of the ACADEMY I thought I should address my communication to you, in slight repayment of all the intellectual benefit and pleasure I have derived from its pages. On that plea, if on no other, I hope I may be pardoned for thus intruding myself on your attention. Here is my little story.

It is now some forty years since I sat conversing with a friend in his villa on the shores of the Bosphorus. That friend was Dr. Stephen Carathéodory, one of the chief physicians to Sultan Mahmoud, and the father of the ex-Governor of Crete, a man who, apart from his profound learning, was so highly respected for his character that even among the Turks themselves every Pasha's door was open to him, and he was welcome everywhere.

"Something very strange happened to me yesterday," said the good doctor to me; "very strange and very vexatious. I had gone to pay a visit to a Turk of my acquaintance on the Asiatic shore, an Ulema residing at the village of Tchenghel-Kioi, and as we sat chatting together in his garden, he all at once asked me who and what 'Arrifas' was. 'How come you to ask me such a question,' said I to him, 'and what do you know about the man whose name you just now mentioned?' 'I know nothing about him,' replied the Ulema, 'but the men you see here at work at the back of my house dug up the other day from under the foundations a large marble slab with some letters cut into it, and out of curiosity I sent for the village grocer (bakal), who was known to be able to read, and that's the name he told me was engraved upon the marble stone. I am sorry I cannot show this to you, for it has since been ground into powder.'"

Such is the story I heard from the doctor's lips, and I give it to you in almost the very words of my lamented friend.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

WE are glad to learn that Dr. Drury E. Fortnum, having quite recovered from the effects of his severe illness, has been able to complete his work on Maiolica, which will probably be ready for publication in the course of next month. Comprising all the more important matter of the South Kensington Catalogue, but modified and augmented in accordance with the researches of the last quarter of a century, this treatise will contain all that is valuable in the known history and characteristics of the various Italian fabriques and of their productions. Dr. Fortnum has also completed the MS. of a Descriptive Catalogue of the collection of those wares now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, which will shortly be put into the printer's hands. Both these works will be illustrated by collotypes from examples in the Ashmolean.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. have in preparation, for issue to subscribers only, The Life and Paintings of Vicat Cole, R.A., in three volumes, written by Mr. Robert Chignell, with reproductions of about eighty examples of the deceased artist's works, either in plates or by tint process in the text, including the entire series of "The Thames from its Source to its Mouth."

THERE will open next week: the inaugural exhibition of the newly founded Cabinet Picture Society—which, we observe, includes several members of the Royal British Artists—at their own gallery, 175, New Bond-street; the usual summer exhibition of French and Dutch pictures, at the Continental Gallery, also in New Bond-street; and Mr. R. Caton Woodville's military picture of "Jameson's Last Stand at the Battle of Doornkop," at Messrs. Henry Graves & Co.'s Gallery, Pall Mall.

PRINCESS LOUISE, Marchioness of Lorne, has consented to open a loan exhibition of pictures on Friday next, at the Bermondsey Settlement, Farncombe-street, Jamaica-road. The exhibition, which is to remain open free to the public through the Whitsuntide holidays, includes pictures by Joshua Reynolds, Turner, Sir John Millais, Sir E. Burne-Jones, Sir John Gilbert, Messrs. Sidney Cooper, Alma Tadema, Seymour Lucas, Holman Hunt, and G. F. Watts.

THE exhibition galleries of the British Museum, Bloomsbury, and also of the National History Museum, Cromwell-road, will for the first time be opened to the public on Sunday next, from 2.30 to 7 p.m. The National Sunday League have made arrangements by which Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen will conduct parties through the Assyrian galleries, and Dr. Henry Woodward through the collections of natural history.

FROM Monday to Wednesday of next week, Messrs. Sotheby will be selling the collection of porcelain, old English pottery, antique silver, paintings, &c., formed by the late J. G. Leonard, of Cambridge. On the last day they will also sell a silver peg tankard, of about twenty-eight ounces, which was made by J. Plummer, of York, for one of the Pennymen family between 1578 and 1597. The six pegs inside indicate six gills, the measure of the tankard.

AT the meeting of the Society of Arts on Wednesday next, Capt. W. de W. Abney will read a paper on "Orthochromatic Photography."

THERE is now on view at Birmingham, in connexion with the spring exhibition of the Birmingham Royal Society of Artists, a loan collection of the works of Mr. Alma Tadema, consisting of about forty of his pictures and as many reproductions of them by engraving or etching.

THE late Miss Julia Gordon has bequeathed a portrait of Mrs. Siddons by Lawrence to the National Gallery; and also all her ornamental china, carved oak, stones, coins, fossils, Bermuda agates, books, &c., to the South Kensington Museum, on the express condition that they be kept as a separate collection under her name.

PROF. SAYCE writes from Cairo, under the date of May 4:

"Petrie's Stela has arrived at the Museum, and it turns out that my reading of the important passage is right, and his and Spiegelburg's are wrong. The campaign of Menepthah was in the south of Palestine, where he received the tribute of Ashkelon; and his reference to the Israelites is the Pharaoh's version of the Exodus. Spiegelberg has now found the name of the Israelites in another of Menepthah's inscriptions, where it has hitherto been overlooked."

A CORRESPONDENT writes from Rome:

"Prof. Lanciani has discovered in the farm of Giostra, near Castel di Leva, twelve kilometres south of Rome, the ruins of a very ancient Italic city, which seems to be Tellene, which was destroyed by Ancus Martius. There remains a very large extent of wall, and the ground is strewn with potsherds.

"The excavations that are being continued at Conca have brought to light another peripteral structure of the temple, and another Javissa, with pottery of later date. A fragmentary inscription of the late Republican period, with a dedication of a Cornelius to the Mater Matuta, proves that the identification of Conca with Satricum is correct."

WE quote the following from the Athens correspondent of the Times:

"The work of restoring the Stadion in marble has been resumed, and the temporary seats constructed for the Olympic Games are being removed. It appears that M. Averoff is prepared to furnish the large sum requisite for complete restoration. The arena will be excavated, and it is expected that many valuable remnants of the ancient structure will be brought to light.

"The excavations which are being carried out in Melos by the British School of Archaeology have resulted in some interesting discoveries. Among these are a draped life-size statue of a priest of Dionysus, of which the head and the left hand are missing; and a colossal statue, perhaps of Apollo, of which the head and limbs are missing, but a portion of the right leg and foot has been recovered. Four draped torsos of the Roman period have also been found, one probably being a statue of Agrippina. A Roman mosaic floor has been laid bare, and some thirty inscriptions have been discovered, most of them being in the peculiar Melian character."

MUSIC.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

SIR AUGUSTUS HARRIS is a wise manager: he makes no promises, and therefore cannot break any. The season opened on Monday evening with Gounod's "Romeo et Juliette," a work which, though far from being equal to his "Faust," yet, if given with a strong cast, is certainly attractive. There were a few weak points in the performance. Of the principal vocalists, Miss Eames may be praised for some excellent singing, though it must be confessed that she is not an ideal Juliette: by temperament she seems scarcely the most suitable representative of Shakespeare's impassioned heroine. Mr. Jean de Reszke, if not quite at his best, gave a fine impersonation of Romeo. Signor Mancinelli was the conductor; and the orchestra, under his able—though at moments over vehement direction—distinguished itself.

On Tuesday evening Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was given in English. The work was, on the whole, well rendered; yet, though successful, the reception was scarcely brilliant. The fact is, Humperdinck's masterpiece, with its rollicking Peter, funny old witch, "Chocolate Villa," and other nursery story associations, seems somewhat out of place in a season of tragic and romantic opera. The public, which takes interest in the love-sick Juliet, the ill-fated Santuzza, or the still more to be pitied Elia, witnesses with cold curiosity, or even indifference, the stage action. The real wonder of the opera is the ever-busy orchestra, in which thematic material—partly taken, partly imitated, from old-folk song—is worked, with rare skill, on Wagner lines. There was genius in the very attempt. To treat simple melodies as Wagner had treated Leitmotive, which, like the themes of Bach's Fugues, were created by intellect and inspiration for the express purpose of passing through various evolutions, seemed almost to court failure. This remarkable achievement of Humperdinck, and the striking contrast between the matter and the manner, is not readily appreciated: the skill of the work only grows on one gradually; the lightness and freshness of the music hide for a time its real merits. The performance of the work at Covent Garden was in many respects admirable. The Gretel and Hänsel were Miss Jessie Hudleston and Mlle. Marie Elba. Both played their parts well; but of the two the latter combines art and nature in more felicitous manner. Mr. Bispham, who represented Peter for the first time, sang well, while his acting showed how carefully he had studied his part. We will not say it was true to the life, for there were moments in which the painstaking artist peeped out from beneath the features of the rough and jolly broom-maker. Mr. Bispham, when the work is repeated, will no doubt modify some of his gestures, and then his Peter will stand as one of his most finished, most characteristic, creations. The stage effect of the Angel's Scene in the second act was disappointing: the way heavenwards was extremely modern, and no halo of mystery pervaded the scene; the lime-light effects, and even the movements of the celestial beings, reminded one rather of ballet or pantomime. The scene is undoubtedly a difficult one to manage, but Sir A. Harris might obtain better results. The orchestral playing, under Signor Mancinelli, was exceedingly good. "La Favorita," one of Donizetti's best works, an excellent specimen of Italian opera in its palmy days, was performed on Wednesday. The part of Leonora was played by Mme. Mantelli, who displayed vocal skill and marked intelligence. Signor Cremonini, a somewhat stiff actor, has a voice of good quality, and an excellent style of singing. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MISS MAUD MACARTHUR, the young Irish violinist who made such a successful début two years ago, gave a violin recital at the small Queen's Hall on Monday afternoon. She is now only twelve years of age; and her programme, including Beethoven's Sonata in C minor for pianoforte and violin, and the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor, seemed too daring. Full justice was rendered to neither, and for two satisfactory reasons. Miss MacArthur, although gifted by nature with rare powers of perception, and quite uncommon technical ability, enabling her to express her thoughts and feelings, is as yet, in manner and conversation, quite childlike. She has never been forced: such a method would, indeed, prove fatal to her. Then, again, she plays upon an instrument not of full size; and as regards quality and power of tone criticism should be relative: what she does accomplish with such limited means is truly astonishing. Her reading of the Beethoven music was pure and intelligent; the Andante of the Concerto was rendered with rare delicacy, and the Finale dashed off—though at no reckless pace—with wonderful verve and technical skill. In a "Mazurka" by Zarzky she displayed the sang-froid of a virtuoso, yet the warmth of a true artist. Miss Fanny Davies was the pianist, and Miss Louise Philipps the vocalist.

On the same afternoon Beethoven's Sonata in C minor was also performed at St. James's Hall by Mr. Willy Burmester and Mr. Ernest Hutchinson. We heard only the first two movements. They were carefully and most intelligently rendered, but certainly lacked warmth. Mr. Hutchinson is an able pianist, and we must take the earliest opportunity of hearing him again. We also hope to notice Mr. Burmester's forthcoming concert.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert gave his second pianoforte recital on Tuesday afternoon. Each time we hear him we feel inclined to defer judgment. Not as regards technique: the performance of his transcription of Bach's organ Toccata and Fugue (he does not hesitate to hyphen his own name with that of the great composer) leaves no doubt as to his extraordinary powers in this direction. Not as regards intelligence: his renderings of the "Appassionata" Sonata at his first recital and of the "Waldstein" on Tuesday prove that he grasps the meaning and feels the power of great music. But there are two matters on which we cannot make up our mind. Is the coldness so noticeable in his interpretation of Chopin's music the outcome of temperament or of nervousness? And are those occasional marked exaggerations of tone and speed the result of excitement, or are they calculated effects to astonish the audience? His playing of the Finale of Chopin's Sonata in B minor was brutally coarse; and we regret to say that it won far more applause than for his, certain affectations notwithstanding, bold reading of the "Waldstein" Sonata.

MAR. Based on the Work of the Rev. ALEX. STEWART, D.D. By H. CAMERON GILLIES, M.D. Crown 8vo, xii.-176 pages, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"A simplified 'Stewart' brought into accord with the latest results of philological research and with frequent reference to the older stages of the language."

SHANFARA'S LAMIYYAT UL' ARAB.

Translated for the first time into English Verse, in the metre of "Lockley Hall," by GEORGE HUGHES, of the Indian Civil Service. Small 4to.

"The oldest, the most obscure, and, perhaps, the finest of pre-Islamic Arab poems, is here translated, line for line, with the closest accuracy, but in a metre and style which bring out its essential affinity of tone and temper with the poem of Tennyson."

JARROLD &amp; SONS' NEW NOVELS

THE POWER of the DOG. An Entirely New Novel. By ROWLAND GREY. Author of "In Sunny Switzerland," "By Virtue of his Office," "Linden-Blumen," "Ohrie." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"One has to read the greater part of this story before one learns that Mr. Grey's title is not metaphorical, and that a real live dog plays the most important part in bringing about the tragic and terrible dénouement. Even if there were neither dog nor dénouement the book would be well worth reading. In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly original."—Daily Chronicle.

"The subject which the author has undertaken to handle is a delicate one, but it is treated with a refinement of feeling and a tenderness of sympathy which leave no doubt as to the wisdom of the purpose for which the story has been written. Much as the attention is absorbed by the central characters, there are others in the volume whose gifts and graces are pictured with equal reality, cleverness, and vigour."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, FIRST VOLUME in
THE "IMPRESSIONIST" SERIES,
BY A NEW AUTHOR, entitled
DUST IN THE BALANCE.

By GEORGE KNIGHT.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

With Title-page and cover design by Laurence Housman.
"Success in art of this kind is not given to everyone. Mr. Knight's skill here shows that he will not go without his reward. He has the gift of bringing together the prose and the poetry of life."

"All the stories are remarkable in technique, the delicate shadowing of character rather than the exact delineation of the orthodox novel, the remarkably wide range of local colour, the astonishing variety of the subjects and the characters, all these are marks of the true artist, and all these are plainly evident in Mr. Knight's book."

"Well written and will repay perusal."—Gloucester Herald.
"Characterised by originality of conception and delicacy of treatment. The volume presents us with an array of impressionist pictures graphically drawn and full of suggestiveness and revealing insight into the deep and tenderest things of life. The book will be read with pleasure by all who enjoy fresh and imaginative work."

BLACKIE &amp; SON'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW VOLUME OF THE WARWICK LIBRARY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

ENGLISH LITERARY

Edited by C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A., Professor of English Literature at University College, Cardiff.

"The plan upon which this series is based is to concentrate attention in each volume on some special form of English literary composition. The first volume, 'English Pastorals,' by Mr. E. K. Chambers, met with a favourable reception, and the present volume, by Professor C. E. Vaughan, will certainly not impair the reputation of this useful series."—The Times.

THE PREVIOUS VOLUME OF THE SERIES:
ENGLISH PASTORALS. Edited by EDMUND K. CHAMBERS, B.A. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The subject has given Mr. Chambers his opportunity of writing one of the best brief essays it has been his happiness to read for a long while. .... It does not see how, as a representative selection of English pastoral verse, it could be bettered. Indeed, it is an exemplary little book, well conceived and well carried out, and it makes one eager for the rest of the series."—A. T. Q. O., in the Speaker.

THE EXPLOITS OF BRIGADIER GERARD

By A. CONAN DOYLE,

Author of "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes."

With 24 Illustrations by W. B. Wollen, R.I.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"Gallantry, humour, martial gaiety, moving incident make up a really delightful book; the Brigadier wins the heart of every gentle reader, and happy would be the lot of the critic if many novels were half as animated, as winning, and as manly as 'The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard.'" Times.

"In these days of pessimistic problem novels, when the element of romance seems to be fading out of fiction, it is delightful to come upon these tales and glories of a soldier's life. They are buoyant, vital, steeped in the stir and the freshness of the open air, abounding in tragedy and gaiety. It is a fascinating book, and one to be read." Daily News.

"We are right glad to have made Brigadier Gerard's acquaintance. He has a vivid narrative style of his own, a style that never lacks of colour." Daily Chronicle.

"The book is well worthy of its author's reputation." Daily Telegraph.

"Writ in a racy style. Brigadier Gerard bids fair to become as popular as Sherlock Holmes." Black and White.

"The hero of Mr. A. Conan Doyle's latest group of stories is one of Napoleon's old cavalry veterans, who has followed the fortunes of the Emperor from Marengo to Waterloo, and finds himself Colonel of the Hussars of Condans before he is well out of his twenties. He is a beau sabreur, a lady-killer, a good bit of a braggart, and, we suspect, not disinclined to take a good pull at the long bow as well as the wine flask; withal a fine fellow, full of pluck and fire, incapable of meanness, and devoted to France, his regiment, and the Emperor." Scotsman.

"Once begun and it is impossible to know where to stop, where all is so excellent, all so exciting. In the whole range of English literature there are not eight short stories to beat 'The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard.'" Freeman's Journal.

"It is a fascinating book, written in an exceedingly simple and swinging style, yet every chapter leaves a vivid impression on the mind." Irish News.

"Those who are looking for a really interesting story can be unhesitatingly advised to read this book. There is not a dull page in it." Echo.

LITERATURE.

A NAVAL ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Naval Administration. By Admiral Sir R. Vesey Hamilton, G.O.B.

The Mechanism of Men-of-War. By Fleet-Engineer Reginald O. Oldknow, R.N.

Torpedoes and Torpedo-Vessels. By Lieutenant G. E. Armstrong, late R.N. (Bell.)

No subject can be of more direct importance to the average Briton than that of the navy which guards his rosy slumbers, and there are probably few upon which he possesses less exact information. A writer of the beginning of the last century observed that there were too many, "and those not ignorant persons in other respects," who could "scarce distinguish between the Admiralty and navy officers, because both had a relation to the maritime power." Sir R. Vesey Hamilton thinks that a similar misunderstanding prevails at the present day. Perhaps this ignorance is in part due to the difficulty which landmen have often pretended to find in the technicalities of naval writers. Forgetting that the best of naval historians before the days of the comparative method was an attorney, and that one of the two greatest of nautical novelists was a West Indian merchant, those of us who have never been to sea in anything finer than a Channel steamer are apt to take refuge in the belief that only those who have braved the dangers of the torpedo-destroyer can comprehend the mystery of the Admiralty. They excuse their ignorance by quoting with approval old Sir William Monson's declaration:

"The sea language is not soon learned, and much less understood, being only proper to him that has passed his apprenticeship; besides that, a boisterous sea and rough weather will make a man not used to it so sick that it bereaves him of legs, stomach, and courage so much as to fight with his meat; and in such weather; when he hears a seaman cry starboard or port, or to bide aloof or to flat a sheet, or haul home a clew-line, he thinks he hears a barbarous speech, which he conceives not the meaning of."

In some respects this complaint is as well founded now as it was in the days of James I. Although the modern writer on naval affairs is concerned with quite other matters than luffs and sheets and clew-lines, his technicalities are no less alarming. Perhaps the details with which he has to deal are more (rather than less) complicated than they were in the days when Blake and mighty Nelson fell, especially so far as the ships themselves are concerned. But their importance to us has also increased. For this, as for many equally obvious reasons, we cordially welcome the excellent idea which Messrs. George Bell & Sons have had, of giving the British public a complete view of the organisation and functions of the Royal Navy, written in language that need present no difficulty to the merest "man in the street."

The series is under the general editorship of Commander O. N. Robinson, R.N., whose short history of The British Fleet is very much alive to testify to his fitness for such a responsibility. It is designed as a complete account of our first line of defence in all its details and branches, from the First Lord down to the rawest boy, from the Royal Sovereign down to Torpedo-boat No. 17. The first three volumes out of the proposed twelve have already appeared; and if one may judge from the excellence of their execution, the complete series will be a quite unique and indispensable body of information and expert opinion upon all the subjects connected with our modern fleet: in short, a naval encyclopædia.

The first volume appropriately deals with the history and present nature of the executive which is responsible for the efficiency of our navy. Its purpose is "to describe the organisation, system, and working of the Board of Admiralty, and of the civil departments through which its operations are conducted, to explain and illustrate the character and procedure of our naval administration." The author, having been First Sea Lord for some years, has the advantage of practical familiarity with his subject: while his zeal in research is illustrated by his modest confession that the compilation of this volume has taught him more of the interior working of the Admiralty than all his experience in a single department could do. On the whole, he thinks well of the system, and betrays a certain pleasure in teaching the public to recognise its services.

"When we read of naval operations, of battles and single-ship actions, of cutting-out expeditions, and of prizes taken from the enemy, we are sometimes apt to forget that behind all this rests the directive hand of the Admiralty Board."

On the other side, when the periodical panic convulses the British public, we are not slow to threaten the somewhat vague personality of the Board with the vengeance of "the wild mob's million feet," if it fails in its duty. The Board, of course, has grown up out of the ancient office of Lord High Admiral, which, like the Treasury, has proved too great a burden for any single pair of shoulders, and is now always put in commission, as has been the practice, with a single brief exception, for nearly two centuries. Arising thus, the administrative system of the Admiralty has retained a happy flexibility which is essential to the nature of its duties. The Lords of the Admiralty are jointly co-equal "Commissioners for executing the office of High Admiral," with a single head, the First Lord, and a number of special departments which serve as hands to carry out their biddings. They are in constant free communication with one another, with the Cabinet Minister above and the permanent officials below them. The whole arrangement, indeed, is like that of a fleet at sea, in which the First Lord is the admiral in charge of the whole and responsible for its doings, while the other Lords are at once his counsellors in forming a decision and his officers in carrying it out.

"Those who know the inner working of our naval administration best, recognise the high value of the consultative functions of the Board, which brings together the highest professional opinion for the guidance of the First Lord, and, enabling its members to discuss every question among themselves, greatly benefits the service by the free interchange of those ideas which build up our naval policy, and lead to the means for carrying it into effect."

Of course, however excellent a system may be, its value depends ultimately upon that of the men who happen to be carrying it out; and all the happy flexibility of our Admiralty is of no avail to counterbalance the disasters that might be caused by a weak or careless First Lord or incompetent counsellors. An enlightened public opinion, on the one hand, and that admirable esprit de corps and devotion to the good of the country for which our navy has always been distinguished, on the other, are our best guarantees that a good system will remain in competent hands. It has by no means always been so. But we have a fair ground for hoping that in the future we shall keep our flag flying as high as it has ever been in the past, when only the self-devotion and skill of our sailors has sometimes availed to neutralise the incompetence or corruption of those at home who should have guided them.

As the first volume of the series deals with the mechanism of the whole service, so the second treats that of the particular ship. In the fifty years or so which have elapsed since the use of steam became general in our navy, our battle-ships have become very complex pieces of machinery indeed. The number of separate engines on board a single ship may range up to a hundred. Mr. Oldknow has given a very clear and concise account of the nature and functions of these in his volume, which is not exactly light reading, but may be cordially recommended to those who, without being practical engineers, know a little about machinery, who want to understand the mechanism of a man-of-war as well as they do that of the locomotive or bicycle of daily life, and are anxious to have some notion of the questions that the service papers are always discussing with incomprehensible heat. For them Mr. Oldknow's book is the very thing. His chapter on "The Battle of the Boilers" and the great water-tube question is equally clear and timely, and his distinct disapprobation of forced draught commends itself to the reader whose common sense has not been debased by the excessive use of statistics.

There are few more interesting subjects to the reader with naval tastes than that of torpedoes and the curious classes of vessels that have been developed for their use. Mr. Armstrong's book, written in a straightforward, sailor-like style, that makes it as readable as a novel, is the very thing that I, for one, have wanted to get hold of for the last half-dozen years. The torpedo is par excellence the weapon of the future. As one cannot but agree with Mr. Armstrong, who is in love with his subject: "The next great naval war will bestow upon the torpedo and its users a halo of romance which will eclipse entirely that surrounding the gun and the ram." A good part of this fascination arises from the forlorn-hope nature of the life in a torpedo-boat on actual service.

"Death by destruction or foundering, explosion of the boilers, collision, or premature explosion of their torpedoes, are dangers which will have to be faced every moment in action. The constant strain will tell terribly on both officers and men. . . . For ever on the qui vive for friends and foes alike, the crew's energy and vitality will be tried to an extent never before required from human beings."

One is happy to see that Mr. Armstrong, who recognises so fully the difficulties of his arm, is bubbling over with enthusiasm for it and confidence that it will be used to effect, even if the users have to perish with the ironclad they destroy. In the meantime, he has given the general reader every facility for appreciating the nature of this deadly arm of the service; and one sincerely trusts that it will be long before we need to turn again to his pages for comprehension of the details of what Mr. Kipling calls "bloody war."

Johnson's Lives of the Poets. A New Edition. With Notes and Introduction by Arthur Waugh. In 6 vols. Vol. I. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

THE interest in eighteenth-century literature shows no signs of flagging. The Lives of the Poets has now come in for its fair share of attention; and two or three complete editions are appearing or about to appear, besides several annotated editions of the more important biographies. That issued by Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co., of which the first volume is before us, will be worthy of the author and the work.

It is well known that Peter Cunningham in his admirable edition of the Lives (1854) showed little reverence for the text, and that he silently transposed passages, corrected dates and names, and in other ways corrupted the text with the object of making the details more accurate. Mr. Waugh, whose name is familiar to us on account of his useful study of Tennyson, has wisely gone back to the text of 1783, the last which had the advantage of Johnson's own corrections. It does not differ materially from that which is given in the ordinary cheap editions of the work; and it has, we may note, been carefully reprinted by Mrs. Napier in "Bohn's Standard Library."

The editor's Introduction is short and readable. In a few brightly written pages he relates the origin of the Lives, and gives us a critical estimate of their value. He unfortunately tells us little of the sources to which Johnson applied for his biographical particulars, though in an edition not specially intended for students this is not to be wondered at. Few well-read men of the present time know Edward Phillips, Jonathan Richardson, Ruffhead, Orrery, Deane Swift, and even Spence, with intimate familiarity; and some account of Johnson's indebtedness to them and to similar writers might have been serviceable. The editor's discussion of Johnson's methods of criticism seems, on the whole, eminently fair and reasonable, and certainly does not make any excessive claims on behalf of the great Cham of literature.

Mr. Waugh, however, hardly makes clear the relation between the competing ideals which divide Johnson's allegiance—correctness, common-sense, and edification. On the one hand, Johnson accepts fully the criticism of correctness. He insists on the need of a poetical diction, and on the requirements of formal accuracy, with regard to verse, figure of speech, and so forth. In this way criticism becomes chiefly negative in method, and, as Dr. Fellows puts it, "he is the best writer against whom the fewest faults can be alleged." On the other hand, Johnson is equally certain that the "common sense of readers uncorrupted with literary prejudices" will have to decide finally the position of every poet in the hierarchy of Parnassus. By common sense, the supreme virtue of the eighteenth century, everything must in the long run be determined. The dicta of Aristotle and Longinus, and of Bossu and Boileau, are subject to its revision. It is his allegiance to common sense, and not his somewhat dull perception of literary beauty, which often saves Johnson's criticism from becoming absurd. His third ideal is that of edification. Moved by this, he adds Sir Richard Blackmore and Dr. Watts to the number of the immortals; while he thinks badly of Gray's "Bard," because it "does not promote any truth, moral or political." I should have been glad to see an attempt to show the exact relation in Johnson's mind between these three tests of excellence. That they are to a large extent incompatible is obvious.

The chief business of the critic is to discriminate clearly the various aims of the author, and to estimate the degree of success with which he thinks those aims are attained. The valuation of the means has more attraction for Johnson than the analysis of the ends. He cannot sympathetically apprehend the objects which writers of other times and other social environments placed before themselves. He has not the flexibility of imagination and the emotional versatility that a critic of the first rank must have. It is impossible for him to project himself into the position of an Elizabethan or a Jacobean poet. It never occurs to him that Arcadia cannot be adequately judged from the latitude of Fleet-street. Besides this defect, Johnson had another. Aesthetically, as well as physically, he was shortsighted; and he lacked the acute and immediate sensibility to beauty which has saved many a great critic from the absurdities of a one-sided theory of art. He saw only the broken rule, the inconsistency of statement, the fallacy in reasoning, the faulty simile, the indifferent rhyme. The apprehension of the beauty which lay beneath the formal error was not granted to him. A profound hint, a vivid glimpse, a thrill of pathos, was as naught to him if suggested by a mixed metaphor or a limping verse.

Much of this Mr. Waugh has seen; but in detail he is not always quite fair to Johnson. Thus, he complains that, while Johnson censures the pastoralism of "Lycidas," he has nothing but praise for the machinery of "The Rape of the Lock."

"The fact is," says Mr. Waugh, "that the artificial environment of Pope's poem was in accordance with the fashion of Johnson's time, while that of Milton's was for the moment obsolete. Johnson's own system of common sense in criticism, had he been capable of applying it without prejudice, must have found even more to condemn in the 'Lock' than in 'Lycidas.' But he could not apply it without prejudice: he could not be altogether free from the contemporary standard, and so he slipped into inconsistency."

It is not difficult, I think, to vindicate Johnson's consistency. True, Arcadia had become a little unfashionable in literature at the end of the eighteenth century. But Johnson's objection to "Lycidas" is not entirely due to what Mr. Waugh oddly calls its "pastoral environment": he equally condemns the triteness and artificiality of its "long train of mythological imagery." Both the pastoralism and the mythology were, he rightly feels, to some extent out of place in a direct utterance of personal feeling. "The Rape of the Lock," however, stood on a different footing. The whole thing was avowedly conventional: it was a mock heroic poem in which the "machinery" of the epic had to be burlesqued as well as its other features. All that Dr. Johnson claims is that the machinery introduced by Pope is novel, well-contrived, and entertaining; which it certainly is. If Pope had brought sylphs and gnomes into the "Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady," Johnson would have been the first to condemn it.

Mr. Waugh's notes show that he has made use of recent sources of information, as well as the annotations of Peter Cunningham, Mrs. Napier, and other previous editors. Here and there, of course, a mistake may be noticed; and a few more annotations might have been advantageously added. Thus, Johnson's statement, into which he was misled by Edward Phillips, that John Milton's mother was named Caston, should have been corrected. A note on the same page (p. 100) tells us that "Macaulay states that Christopher (the poet's brother) had leanings to the Roman Church," which, though no doubt true, is certainly misleading. One of the most frequently quoted passages in Evelyn's Diary is that in which he mentions that among the new judges was "Milton, a Papist (brother to that Milton who wrote for the regicides), who presum'd to take his place without passing the Test." (Diary, June 2, 1686.) Again a page or two later Mr. Waugh reproves Johnson for speaking of Alabaster's Latin tragedy "Roxana" as earlier than Milton's Latin elegies. It is true that "Roxana" was not published till 1632, as Cunningham mentions; but Mrs. Napier reminds us that it had been acted in Elizabeth's reign; and Mr. A. H. Bullen tells us that it must have been performed at Cambridge before 1592. Instead of the useless note on p. 109, informing us that at Florence Milton heard Leonore Baroni sing, the judicious reader would have been glad of information about Selvaggi and Salsilli. Fenton, too, is not the original authority as to the charms of the daughter of Dr. Davis, whom Milton appears to have regarded with bigamous intentions at the time of the quarrel with his first wife. Fenton's statement is derived from Philip's Life of his uncle.

But, after all, these are small matters; and we have good reason to thank Mr. Waugh and his publishers for the most comely edition of the Lives that has appeared since Cunningham's. Five portraits without names, and apparently of doubtful authenticity, appear in the volume. Type and paper are alike excellent; and although its cloth binding is not entirely satisfactory, this is the less a disadvantage since the book well deserves the honour of calf or morocco.

FREDERICK RYLAND.

The Most Gorgeous Lady Blessington. By J. Fitzgerald Molloy. (Downey.)

THERE is every reason why this book should have been written; for, apart from the fact that the writer has been permitted to make use of "six volumes of letters in Mr. Morrison's possession, addressed by the leading men and women of the day to the Countess, or written by herself," no Life of the renowned beauty has been published since Mr. Madden's voluminous Life and Correspondence, in three very large volumes. There was every reason, I repeat, for producing a new Life of Lady Blessington in a compact and handy form, and no apology was necessary for such an undertaking. But when one glances through the older biography, and sees how enormously Mr. Molloy must have been aided by it in his labours, I must confess it does seem to savour of ingratitude for him to say, as he does most deliberately, "No luminous biography of Lady Blessington has ever been written."

In his modest preface Mr. Madden told his readers

"an intimate acquaintance and interrupted friendship with the late Countess of Blessington during a period of twenty-seven years, and the advantages of possessing the entire confidence of that lady, are the circumstances which induced the friends of Lady Blessington to commit to me the task of editing an account of her literary life and correspondence."

While, then, Mr. Molloy's two charming volumes ought to find their place on the drawing-room tables of those to whom books are treasures, the older and more sombre volumes are not superseded, but still remain the authority for students of what we may call the Byronic period of English literature.

The father of Lady Blessington was a typical Irish squire of the last century: not as he is here misnamed, a "squireen," which is in Ireland a term of opprobrium usually associated with an upstart or a middle-man, but never applied to a country gentleman, as, by position at least, Edmond Power undoubtedly was. He was one of the hard-drinking, reckless, extravagant men of his time,

"whose love of display drifted him into debt and difficulties."

"Tall, straight-built and handsome, florid of face, peremptory of speech, he dressed in leather breeches and top boots, wore white cravats, frills, ruffles, and top seals, which costume helped to give him a showy and impressive appearance and to gain for him among his fellow squires the names of 'Beau Power' and 'Shiver the Frills.'"

Her mother was of too weak a character to influence her husband for good: she had probably so grown up with the manly vices of her time as not to recognise their existence. She was "too much absorbed," we are told, "in the glories of 'me ancestors the Desmonds' to enter into the inner lives of her children, of whom (sic) she bore six."

The folly and recklessness of Power soon came to its natural ending:

"His property, which at one time had brought him fifteen hundred a year, became, through neglect and increasing debt, of less and less value. But so long as he could have dogs and hunters, and enjoy wine and revelry, the world went well with him, and he was content to put off till to-morrow such unpleasant considerations as tradesmen's bills and obtruding (sic) bailiffs."

When the inevitable day of reckoning did come, and nearly all the property had to be sold, poor "Shiver the Frills," for the first time, must of necessity soil his aristocratic fingers with business. Surely "me ancestors the Desmonds" must have turned in their graves and groaned.

It is an unpleasant picture we are afterwards shown of Power, with whom the times, as we say in Ireland, "were going hard." Various methods of making money had been tried, with bad results; and, as the man's income became lower his vices sank also to a lower level. From the handsome, open-handed sporting squire, with a fine, gentlemanly taste for generous wine, he soon became a sordid drunkard:

"He treated his wife with brutality, and became the terror of the home, where he delighted to display his tyranny. . . . Terror-stricken by his fury, his cruelty, and his drunken oaths, his children fled from his approach."

Equally sordid is the scene of the future Lady Blessington, standing in her father's shabby dining-room, in an atmosphere heavy with the smell of roast meat and whisky, when the order was given that she should marry Captain Farmer, for whom she had an instinctive dread—an instinct afterwards justified by events, for the man became a lunatic. The young wife of sixteen, who was "between the devil and the deep sea"—an insane husband and a brutal father—put herself under the protection of a Captain Jenkins, from whom she was transferred to Lord Blessington, who, on the most opportune death of Farmer, made her his wife. And, as Mr. Molloy relates with admirable naïveté,

"no sooner had she parted from Captain Jenkins than Lord Blessington sent him a cheque for £10,000, the presumed value of the jewels and apparel given by Jenkins to Margaret Farmer."

From poverty, with all its petty shifts and miseries, the scene is now changed to one of the most dazzling wealth, and if any inherited vices linger around the most gorgeous lady, they are so daintily gilded that we must call them by some other name.

The most repulsive actions of Lady Blessington's life were the arranged marriage of her poor little step-daughter with Count D'Orsay, and of her subsequent friendship with the French count, whom Byron described as having all the air of a cupidon déchainé. Our biographer is at pains to tell us, again and again, how thoroughly innocent was the friendship between the most gorgeous lady and the most captivating count; and heaven forbid that any one to-day should follow the scandal-mongers who thought otherwise. But, apart from the question of graver guilt, was not the marriage of this young girl—this child of sixteen to the man-of-the-world, blasé, selfish, and sensual—in itself quite vile enough. The girl was hurried into a contract, the nature of which she was ignorant of. Why did the man marry her? What could he have seen in this bread-and-butter miss? We are told of the interview between Miss Power and her drunken father in a room heavy with the odour of whisky and hot meat, and of her subsequent interview with her weak mother, to whom she had flown in vain for sympathy—that mother and father had, at least, the excuse of poverty, that weak mother could not have helped her daughter. But Lord Blessington and his most gorgeous lady had no such excuse, and Lady Blessington could have prevented the marriage—if she would. On the whole, I am inclined to think that a vile action is none the less vile because the air is redolent with the scent of vervain and roses.

It is interesting to reflect that, if Lady Blessington had not taken to literature, she might have succeeded well as a matrimonial agent. She arranged a marriage between her sister and a French nobleman twice her age. Either party was deceived into thinking that the other had wealth, and they finally parted.

It is in the after period of Lady Blessington's life that her better nature seems to assert itself. She then devoted the energies of her mind to the calm pursuits of literature, lived down much of the prejudice which existed against her, and gathered around her the most illustrious men of her time. We have here published "for the first time," as we are told, "letters which Disraeli, Dickens, Landor, Barry Cornwall, Marryat, Macready, Lord Lytton, and others addressed to her." The inclusion of these letters alone make the work a useful addition to any library; but, I may remark, in passing, that an index would have made it still more valuable.

A number of racy anecdotes are collected together. Disraeli figures in Lady Blessington's salons, of all others the most interesting figure. Some of the descriptions are excellent—as, for example, in the chapter which introduces young Disraeli:

"A curious figure that derided sobriety, he looked half contemptuously, half amusedly, and with some curiosity at the life around him. Fluent, his words seemed to conceal his thoughts; vivacious, it appeared impossible to penetrate him."

And how great he was for all his fopperies, which, unlike those of poor Byron, were mere externals. And, stranger still, in sober, conservative English society, where aberrations of morals and of intellect are far more tolerated than eccentricities of dress, this young Hebrew could enter a drawing-room, arrayed in "a scarlet waistcoat, long laced ruffles falling down to the tips of his fingers, white gloves with several brilliant rings outside them, and long black ringlets rippling upon his shoulders."

Count D'Orsay was an admired member in the circle. Thank heaven, not admired by all! Mrs. Newton Orosland, whom he once took into dinner, remarked that his hands, "large, white, and apparently soft, 'had not the physiognomy which pleases the critical observer and student of hands' for they indicated self-indulgence." He struck her moreover as being "mannish rather than manly, and yet with a touch of effeminacy quite different from that woman-like tenderness which adds to the excellence of man." Thackeray met the splendid humbug in 1850, and describes him as "living in a charming atelier, which he has fitted up for himself with arms and trophies, pictures and looking-glasses, the tomb of Blessington, the sword and star of Napoleon, and a crucifix over his bed. And here he dwells," writes the cynic, "without any doubts or remorse, admiring himself in the most horrible pictures which he has painted, and statues which he gets done for him."

The Count had received within twelve months of his marriage a sum of twenty thousand pounds, while Lord Blessington arranged that after his decease a similar sum should be settled upon him for life. So generous a dower—a genuine pretium puellas as it was—might have made him kindly disposed towards his child-wife, who, three years after her marriage, when she had reached the age of nineteen, grew to be a remarkably handsome woman. Not for her was the "brilliant wit" and "wonderful fascination" which made D'Orsay the pet of society. That was reserved for others.

"Instead of being the wife of her husband, and the mistress of her home, she found herself a supernumerary in a circle with which she had no sympathy. Disagreements followed, rebellion set in; and in the autumn of 1831 she and Count D'Orsay separated by mutual consent."

Afterwards she repeated the early portion of her stepmother's married life, upon a far grander scale (vires acquirit eundo), by gaining the friendship and "fostering kindness" of the Duc d'Orléans, prince royal of France, and son of Louis Philippe.

An amusing sketch is given of the latter days of Mme. Guiccioli, the friend of Byron. Her husband having died, in 1840, she had waited for some one to wed her, and finally succeeded in capturing an ancient nobleman, the Marquis de Boissy, who was a collector of curios and rare editions. To him the fact of his wife having had a liaison with a great poet made her as valuable as a rare copy of some old book, or an antique vase with a flaw or two. He was wont to introduce her to his friends as "Madame la Marquise de Boissy ma femme, ci-devant maitresse de Lord Byron." It is not hard to imagine the dear old creature rubbing his hands as he said this, and after a little while taking his guest by the arm, with, "And now, mon ami, you must permit me to show you ma Brechesse Bible!"

What a gay world it was. How it would afford material for nice reflections in a sequel to "Little Arthur's History of England"—if there be any "Little Arthur" nowadays, which is extremely doubtful? It would be so easy to tell how very different the ways of society have grown—how little the D'Orsays are tolerated: how they are estimated at their real worth, and not for fine clothes, and a superficial polish, and a smart repartee, and suave mannerisms. But this is verging very closely on cynicism, a quality quite intolerable in a reviewer.

GEORGE NEWCOMEN.

Studies in Economics. By William Smart, Lecturer in Political Economy in the University of Glasgow. (Macmillans.)

THIS book deserves to be mentioned as far superior to the general run of the works dealing with economic and social problems which are so numerous at present. Mr. Smart's qualifications are well stated in his preface:

"My credentials for writing on wages, currency, and consumption are that these are subjects which I may claim to have looked at from more than one side. My apprenticeship to industry, as an employer of labour, brought me in close contact with questions of wages and prices; and during these years I was fortunate enough to fall under the influence, personal and literary, of Mr. Ruskin, by whom my thoughts were turned to the questions of wealth and its consumption, and to the gospel of work which he had learned from Carlyle. But my pleasant task of late years, in presenting to English readers the work of the Austrian school, has made me entirely a convert to its fundamental doctrine, that the theory of value is the beginning of economic science, and compelled me to revise all my conclusions in the searching light of that theory."

The author's treatment of his topics shows considerable originality and breadth of view. Some might object that he introduces considerations which are extraneous to an economic treatise, but his answer is that social problems cannot be solved by looking merely at the economic aspects of the subject. His general impartiality of tone and his desire to put both sides of the case fairly before his readers is well illustrated in the following passage:

"The Socialists would assert that, if production were regulated and directed to the sole end of raising the general level of wealth and comfort, and if the making and, consequently, the consumption of foolish and wasteful forms of wealth were stopped, the increase of wealth per head would be so great that every family of five would have within its reach every luxury reasonable for health and culture. On the other hand, the Individualist would assert that the introduction of a regulated, uncompetitive system would so take away the motive to hard work, so disorganise the fine web of industrial organisation, and so frighten away capital to other countries, that the level all over would be indefinitely below the wealth now represented by the incomes named."

Some may possibly find a little difficulty in grasping what precisely is the theory of value which Mr. Smart regards as the foundation of his reasonings, and, indeed, he himself admits that the subject is somewhat abstruse. His position is stated in the following terms:

"The thesis I intend to put forward is, that on the principles laid down, at any given time, primitive or otherwise, the factors of production have a certain value. This value is given and measured by their total product, the national dividend. This value they may in certain circumstances transfer to particular products; it is the 'cost price' of the factors of production. Thus and thus alone, cost of production determines value."

This may not seem perfectly clear to all, though the author does his best to make it more comprehensible by practical illustrations. The conclusions he draws from these principles are, in the first place, that

"Cost is a true irreducible minimum. If the labourer can find what his cost is—and the world of competition is always tending to give him that information—he has the best possible right to see that his labour is never employed at anything under the figures of price in which this cost is expressed."

Mr. Smart further contends:

"That the share which labour gets under modern circumstances is rightly conceived a double share. It is the larger share of a larger loaf, and that not in virtue of strength, but in virtue of purely economic causes."

It might appear, then, that our author must be ranked among the supporters of the view that unrestricted competition is a blessing to the labourer, and that all restraints on it are to be condemned; and, indeed, he goes on to describe all trades union restrictions as economically indefensible. He admits, however, that they may be defended on other grounds:

"For instance, if it is the case that enthusiasm for a large product and large wage tends to make people work long hours, and under insanitary conditions, although this may increase the loaf of product, it yet saps the life of those who are to live off the loaf, and so is a short-sighted policy."

The special application of this position to the question of the labour of women and children is well illustrated.

Mr. Smart is evidently an advocate of bi-metallism; but it cannot be said that he has brought forward any very forcible arguments on its behalf. His chapter on the subject is the briefest and by no means the most satisfactory section of the book.

Both Socialists and anti-Socialists will appeal to the different portions of Mr. Smart's pages as corroborating their conclusions, from which it may be judged that he has endeavoured with some success to hold the scales even, and to abstain from hasty dogmatism on one side or other of this momentous controversy. If the latter may quote the passages already referred to on the benefits of competition, the former may with equal justice bring forward passages in the two final chapters on "The Socialising of Consumption" and "The Place of Industry in the Social Organism," as bearing out many of their contentions.

Our author makes it quite clear that he is not one of those who believe in the perfect wisdom of the doctrine of laissez faire, and the following weighty and measured review of the results of its practical working deserves to be carefully studied:

"Our century's experiment of leaving industry to rectify its own abuses cannot be called a success. It has ended in putting very effectually out of sight the right and due of every man, as a spiritual being, to get the utmost assistance from his fellows in securing him a rational, happy, developing, free life. It has raised a few people to a habitual standard of leisure and luxury, which they find so good and enjoyable that they will fight to retain it. It has made the richer classes accept seriously the ridiculous position of thinking themselves the favoured of heaven and believing that Christ's statement, 'the poor ye have always with you,' is a warrant for keeping them poor, or, at least for telling them that Providence is responsible for their poverty. Nay, it has so stripped the working classes of thought and aspiration, that as a whole they accept the present state of things for the most part in apathy, though not without sullen mutterings."

Mr. Smart may not be so sanguine as some social reformers as to the possibilities of the immediate future, but on a wider forecast, he is a decided optimist:

"Whatever the present may be, it is clear to the economist that the future holds unimaginable wealth in its command. The environment is friendly. The economic sphere will not always be truthfully represented as a struggle of labour against nature, or a calculus of pleasure and pain."

He does not even shrink from maintaining a position which is often regarded as the height of Socialist extravagance:

"The abolition of poverty is now within our reach if we, as a society, are really bent on its abolition. The resources of the nation in capital, invention, and labour are now so great that the one want of the time is organisation, so that there shall be no misdirection of production, no waste in consumption, no friction from currency. That there should be unemployed men in Great Britain arises from the same cause as brings about those frightful crises and this universal uncertainty—that we have not brought consumer and producer to understand each other and work into each other's hands, and that the best brains of the nation have not yet been turned to organising its industry."

WITHOUT possessing any absorbing interest,

A Mine of Wealth is carefully written, and contains several well-drawn characters. The central figures are a strong-minded and somewhat unscrupulous widow, Mrs. Beddoes, whose temper has been severely tried by a disappointment in early life; and her daughter Sara, who, at the opening of the story, becomes heiress to an unexpected fortune, not at all to the satisfaction of Mrs. Beddoes, who is furious at having been passed over by the testator. There is not much colour in Sara's character, who is little except an affectionate daughter and devoted fiancée under rather trying circumstances. The author's most successful portrait is undoubtedly the widow. More than twenty years before the date of the story she had been engaged to the young Lord Stretton, a weak-minded youth, who is persuaded by his mother to break off the engagement and retrieve the impoverished fortunes of the family by marrying a wealthy heiress. The discarded object of his affections marries Mr. Beddoes in a fit of pique; and now, when nearly a quarter of a century has elapsed, and two ill-assorted unions have been terminated by a death on either side, the widower and the widow are again free to renew the intimacy of their youth. Great skill is shown by the writer in developing this part of the narrative. Among the minor characters, Jethro Cobbin, guardian of Sara Beddoes, and George Lumb, an astute and taciturn butler, deserve honourable mention.

The Master of Trenance is described on the title-page as "a mid-century romance," the date being put back nearly fifty years from the present time in order, apparently, to allow the delineation of certain details, essential to the story, of a public execution. A good many features of the old-fashioned "romance" are discernible throughout. The proverbial wicked baronet is represented by Mr. Arthur Vipond, Master of Trenance—a Cornish estate, of course—who attempts, often successfully, to seduce the maidens of the neighbourhood, and brutally ill-treats his wife. There is a Meg Merrilies in the shape of Moyra Tremewan, a witch-woman with the secrets of half the countryside in her possession; and a number of minor villains who help to keep the excitement at concert pitch. It will be inferred from what has been said that this is essentially a novel of incident and action; at the same time it is very far removed from the level of the cheap novelette style of fiction. Bel Jansen and her sister Grace, daughters of old Stephen Jansen of Starving Rock, an islet off the coast, are capitally drawn characters; and the combination of circumstances by which a totally innocent man—though a thoroughly-paced scoundrel in other respects—is condemned to death and executed is, if painful reading, a highly powerful piece of description. The book may fairly be recommended to all lovers of the sensational.

Bryon once wrote of poets "whose annual strains, like armies, take the field." Some of our present-day novel writers deserve the compliment of being far more industrious than this: their productions appear in full bloom at nothing longer than quarterly intervals—in some cases the periods are even shorter. Alan St. Aubyn appears to possess a fecundity almost inexhaustible in the production of fictitious narrative, and one has scarcely had time to read and review the last of her novels before a further addition to the family appears upon the scene. To the credit of the author, it must be admitted that the latest—we speak under reserve, in fear of error—product of her prolific imagination, To Step Aside is Human, not only betrays no marks of haste in its composition, but is entitled to a good deal of commendation in several respects. The shallow, invertebrate young doctor, Dick Lampen, is a character familiar to readers of this author's books, though more often associated with a black coat and white tie. But Bel Lampen, the American girl, who marries for his money a young Englishman, a hopeless invalid, and after his death falls desperately in love, and nearly succeeds in marrying his cousin Geoffrey, the heir to the estate, is an amazing success in point of descriptive effect. Without touching any high artistic level, the book is easily and pleasantly written throughout, as, indeed, most of this author's later productions have been; and it is difficult to understand why her title-page should still continue to perpetuate the memory of that crude and absurd production, A Fellow of Trinity.

Mr. Rider Haggard has again treated us to one of his tales of weird mystery and marvellous adventure. That his new book, Heart of the World, a tale of the American Indians, will find plenty of eager readers there need be no doubt, just as little as it can be doubted that he possesses marvellously graphic power and first-rate abilities for the particular class of fiction in which he figures so prominently. But to give his story unqualified praise is another matter. His "Heart of the World" is a fabulous Golden City, situated upon an island, the surface of which is below the level of the waters of the surrounding lake at certain seasons of the year, and which is only prevented, therefore, from being entirely submerged by a colossal system of dams and breakwaters. Here was maintained in all its purity the primeval faith of the aboriginal Indians, together with all their chronicled traditions and hoarded treasures; and here it was that adventures of an astonishing kind befel an Englishman, James Strickland, Maya, his wife and Lady of the Sacred Heart, and Don Ignatio, last of the ancient Indians, whose narrative forms the substance of the tale. Of mere thrilling incident there is enough from beginning to end, but it is difficult to find much other praise for the book; and it seems a pity that the author with his great gifts should be content to write down to the level of the schoolboy.

It is the fault of sporting novels that they are apt to carry the atmosphere of the stable about them in too pronounced a manner to please the taste of critics and fastidious readers. It is a pleasure, therefore, to be able to record the fact that in Juanita Carrington, a novel named after the young lady who takes the leading part, Mrs. Jocelyn has contrived to steer clear of all of this; and, though there is plenty of cross-country riding here and there, we are not bored to death with it. The author has devoted herself with much success to a real, downright love-making story of thoroughly satisfactory pattern. Juanita, a girl of seventeen, who has been adopted by her uncle and aunt, Sir Henry and Lady Carrington, ought, in the nature of things, to marry Dick Waldgrave, son and heir of the owner of the adjoining estate, and the expectant possessor of enormous wealth. Instead of this, she prefers to lose her heart to Lord Vanders, an impecunious society man, shady in regard to reputation, but the straightest of riders, the deadliest of shots, and everything else which could go to win the admiration of a country-bred girl. How the love flame is quenched by a widowed duchess, who has long marked Lord Vanders for her own, is excellently told; and the novel, which is full of clever society sketches, should be regarded by the general public as greatly superior to A Dangerous Brute, its immediate predecessor.

Of Silvio Bartholi, Painter, there is no word of disparagement to be said. It is a simple love-story, filled with pathetic touches of human weakness, and the silent agony of a disappointed heart; but the surroundings, replete with local colour, lend an interest and variety to the narrative which might be lacking to incidents occurring nearer home. The scene of the story is in the Italian town of Siena, the gorgeous solemnities of the Catholic ritual are set forth with devout appreciation, and the figure of the aged painter is depicted with genuine artistic skill. The faults and follies of the young painter Luigi, the simplicity of Margherita, his young wife, and the heroism of Vera, Silvio's daughter, furnish a fund of affectionate interest for readers.

The Judge of the Four Corners is an American book, and, therefore, can only be safely recommended to those readers who relish Transatlantic modes of thought and expression. The story is mainly concerned with a married couple, who fall out with one another and part, to meet again after twenty years, when the husband, who has all the time been as loyal at heart to his wife as she has to him, ventures to revisit his wife, and, finding that she does not recognise him, proceeds to make love to her, with partial success, but only because, as she afterwards explains, every tone of voice and motion of body reminds her so exactly of the lost husband for whom she is pining. The conception is a pretty and original one, and the book is in other respects written with a good deal of power.

The author of Margaret Grainger has for several years past been known to the world as the writer of books bringing specially under notice the claims of women to be allowed the exercise of certain functions associated traditionally with the male sex, and the male sex only. We can scarcely do less than give her our cordial encouragement in this object. The book under review needs, however, no such encouragement. It is concerned solely with the reminiscences of a schoolmistress, and the business of a schoolmistress has from all time been considered appropriate to women. The narrative is merely anecdotal, recalling past experiences with pupils of very different character. It is told in exquisite taste, and the insight given into the lives of the various children Margaret Grainger has had under her care cannot fail to prove pleasant reading.

People who do not mind homely, gossiping narrative will like My Dear Grenadier, which concerns a household of seven boys, of various ages, and one girl, who writes the narrative. The "grenadier" is a girl friend standing six-foot-one in her stockings, with marvellous personal attractions, who fairly carries away the hearts of the elder portion of the seven brothers. Patricia Gore-Hatherton, their sister, is also devoted to the grenadier, Beatrice Damer; and her discovery that the latter is betrothed to Lord Edward Chandos, with whom she herself has fallen in love, leads up to a course of considerable heroism on her part. Ultimately she has her reward.

BOOKS OF VERSE.

Ann Morgan's Love. By Arthur Munby. (Reeves & Turner.) Ann was brown and beautiful. For several years she had attended to all the household wants of her young master, polishing his furniture, cooking his cabbages, swirling mops in the little back yard, and using her muscles as only a labour-loving, country-bred maid can. Born to work, proud of work, restless without work, this hearty girl had no further ambition than to content the man who employed her; while he, for his part, gradually believed that true happiness was destined to arrive in his life through marriage with Ann Morgan, for he was in search of a woman owing all her graces to nothing but nature. Never mind accurate grammar, or smooth hands, or studied deportment borrowed from the boarding-school, or a doubtful skill in the management of ragged arpeggios. Very happy was the servant-girl when her master became her husband. She travelled a little, arrayed herself in plumes which she regarded as peacockian, and then prevailed on her lord to let her go back to such domestic offices as she had enjoyed before her marriage. It gave her no pleasure to rise above the station in which she was born; and she desired to cleave to her dialect, some of the peculiarities of which Mr. Munby presents to us in the following passage. Here is an excellent chance for American editors in search of a good subject for a prize competition. So many dollars for the individual who can translate the provincialisms into the best Broadway English:

"Her speech too—could she alter it at will? 'No,' said her husband, 'and you shall not try!'"

For he derided grammar, and he loved That folk-speech of the Marches, full of words Vivid, expressive, picturesque; unknown To southern ears, but old and accurate As Chaucer's English; aye, and older far. She was no gosterer, yet he knew full well How she could snape a rodney, hiking him Back to his work; and how with lusty arms She bested other women, when agate Keeping her barrer, thrutching at the coals; And how, on Easter Tuesday, she would oes To clip and heave her sweetheart up on high. Ah, and he knew that she was never fause, Nor fratchety, nor pizy; she was still Herself, as peart and jamnock as the best. Therefore said he, 'You shall not change your note;

It is your own: these many hundred years Your peasant fathers spoke as you speak now. Why should you change? Your dialect, my wench,

Is part of England's history.' She laugh'd; It seem'd so strange that anything she did Should have to do with history!"

If our memory does not play us a trick, this is not the first time that Mr. Munby has described the progress of married love between a cottager's daughter and a gentleman's son. Whether or no he means a sermon to be preached through the medium of blank verse, employing the poetic muse to decorate a theory, there is no need for us to inquire too closely. If everything of a subversive sort were advanced as pleasantly as the idea of Ann Morgan's Love is brought forward by Mr. Munby, a very pretty mingling of the kid-glove and hobnail methods of criticism would result. For the way in which he has drawn the character of Ann the author deserves the thanks of thousands.

Late Lyrics. By T. B. Aldrich. (John Lane.) When in the greening woods and bright meadows such immortal poems as the cuckoo and the cuckoo's song can be gathered by the hand and by the ear, it is more than a little difficult to repress a desire for roaming, and to stay indoors with a parcel of books. Search as we may for an elegant compliment, we do not know that we can discover a better one for Mr. Aldrich than an acknowledgment of the content created in us by his small volume of beautiful brevities. At the moment when we took up Late Lyrics, we felt vastly inclined to go and read from the summit of a hill the great green pages of Nature's composition; but after a quarter of an hour spent in Mr. Aldrich's company we became more placid, tempted to endure four walls by such lines as these:

"A TOUCH OF NATURE."

"When first the crocus thrusts its point of gold Up through the still snow-drifted garden mould, And folded green things in dim woods uncloze Their crinkled spears, a sudden tremor goes Into my veins and makes me kith and kin To every wild-born thing that thrills and blows. Sitting beside this crumbling sea-coal fire, Here in the city's ceaseless roar and din, Far from the brambly paths I used to know, Far from the rustling brooks that alip and shine Where the Neponset alders take their glow, I share the tremulous sense of bud and briar And inarticulate ardours of the vine."

There are good reasons why a certain Biblical reproach should be levelled against men and women to-day. Folks who have eyes, yet see not, still abound. There are people who notice millions of celandines, and yet never discover in what particulars this flower differs from a buttercup; just as there are people who, after watching trees break into bud every year, call early chestnuts sycamores and sycamores chestnuts. Eyes have they, and see not. But Mr. Aldrich is not careless of the talent of sight. He has a keen glance for the common and the least, and bends as a worshipper to the obscure creations, finding joy resident in them and passing her on to his less observant brethren in the shape of tuneful lyrics. Let us hope that they receive his gifts with a feeling of gratitude. It will not surprise a single reader to hear that Mr. Aldrich occasionally marches from excellence in the direction of mediocrity; but as his virtues so markedly outnumber his vices, we may depart from him with no examples of jealous scrutiny.

Christ in Hades. By Stephen Phillips. (Elkin Mathews.) Wandering in search of poets with a shilling's worth of song for sale, Mr. Elkin Mathews will certainly travel a considerable distance before he finds a singer to supply him with a better bundle of poems than that delivered into his charge by Mr. Stephen Phillips. Upon every page of this tiny volume it is easy to discover proof of the advance made by the author in the art of metrical composition. Although we have been literally pelted by adventurous versifiers since the day when Mr. Phillips sent us his first-fruits in the shape of a small book entitled Eremus, we remember enough of it to be sure that in Christ in Hades the touch of the artist is freer and more valiant. Notable, too, is the increase in the number of arresting lines. But most marked of all is the growth of ease in the author's style. Mr. Phillips can now write blank verse, which is, if we may so express ourselves, more bendable, and, therefore, far richer in music. If nine out of every ten reviewers do not hasten to describe the title-poem of this garland as a piece both dignified and admirable, we shall be surprised. If, on the other hand, nine out of ten critics hold views contrary to our own, we shall take the liberty of retiring into our native obstinacy, so firmly are we convinced that our swan is not a goose. Mr. Phillips follows his important achievement with a handful of lyrics. Here is one displaying a welcome freshness of treatment. The third stanza is, in our opinion, de trop:

"O to recall!
What to recall?
All the roses under snow?
Not these.
Stars that toward the water go?
Not these.

"O to recall!
What to recall?
All the greenness after rain?
Not this.
Joy that gleameth after pain?
Not this.

"O to recall!
What to recall?
Not the greenness nor delight?
Not these.
Not the roses out of sight?
Not these.

"O to recall!
What to recall?
Not the star in waters red,
Not this;
Laughter of a girl that's dead,
O this!"

As a rule, the modern minor poet charges five shillings (net) for from eighty to a hundred pages. Mr. Phillips supplies thirty-two for a fifth of the sum, so lovers of a good bargain should not let such an opportunity slip.

Random Rhymes. By Sam Wood. (Barnsley: W. R. Massie.) It is very pleasant to be reminded once more how little the poetic muse deserves to be called a toady. She leaves to men and women all fawning and flattering pursuits; she regards the peer and the peasant with the same frank friendliness; and though willing enough to walk on Persian carpets, she is equally happy to hear her own footfall on the red-tiled floors of cottages. Tailor-made women may shrink from the slums as from places accursed; but the muse is not so nice. With the utmost heartiness, a song on her lips, and speed in her willing feet, she will enter to bless the dingiest abodes, however shrilly the elect of wealth and position may whistle her to return. One of her more recent friends is Mr. Sam Wood, a singer hailing from Barnsley, whose career contains many points of interest. We understand that, when Mr. Wood was a mere lad, he used to labour in a coal-pit; at the age of twenty he could not write his own name; and now, being still a young man, we find him driving two such opposite trades as those of poet and boiler-maker. If only he be as proficient in the manufacture of these domestic monsters as he is in the fashioning of wholesome and musical verses, he is sure of a double success. We do not profess to be good judges of nuts which grow in workshope, and what we know about steel filings is not worth learning; but we can be trusted to speak a warm word when boiler-makers send us such pleasing strains as the following. The poem is called "To the First Celandine":

"Ere the sweet thrush attuned its speckled throat,
Or ere the blackbird's thrilling song was heard,
My eager glance thy golden petals caught,
And I was strangely stirred.

"The buds upon the thorn were scarcely seen,
Nor had the fluttering lark essayed to sing,
When thou appeared'st amid the quickening green,
A solitary thing.

"Lured into bloom by one brief sunny day,
Thy fleeting life, alas! must soon be o'er;
But 'tis thy honoured lot to lead the way
For countless millions more.

"Thou art the herald of a lovely race;
But though 'tis thine to die ere storms are stilled,
Thou mayest depart contented from thy place,
Thy mission all fulfilled.

"Thou canst not live to see the spring unfold;
Nor view the glory of a vernal day;
Thou canst not linger, blooming, to behold
The crowning wealth of May.

"Yet thine is but the lot of such as lead
Onward to glorious periods, alone,
Of such as in the battle fight and bleed,
And die at victory's dawn."

Mr. Wood displays his best powers when he sings of birds and grasses and such silvery vagabonds as streams. He is by no means infelicitous in his treatment of roundels and villanelles, though, for the most part, he lacks that exquisite delicacy of touch which alone redeems these flimsialities (if we may be allowed to coin a word) from the charge of triviality. These pieces of arbitrary rhyming suggest the greenhouse. We prefer English blossoms that grow with valiance out in the open, and these we advise Mr. Wood to cultivate with assiduity.

Poems. By Ernest McGaffey. (New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.) Although we are really and truly grateful to the author of Poems for a considerable number of beautiful verses, we cannot help regretting keenly that he did not allow one or two of his candid friends to make for him a representative selection from his somewhat prodigal output. Poems is far too long. No one boasting the possession of a pennyweight of discernment will fail to observe scores of verses which by their departure would add value to the volume. When confronted by these and Mr. McGaffey's numerous examples of fine workmanship, all lumped together higgledy-piggledy, we cannot refrain from being irritated by the dominance of indiscriminating fecundity. There are enough finished and fragrant poems between these covers to make up a small volume of peculiar charm, while scattered lines, couplets, whole verses of true worth, positively abound. For example:

"The song that leaped from the lips of sirens Dies away in an old sea-shell."

And here is a complete poem, which makes us feel as if we were in the very place listening to the bird. But why will the Americans christen their songsters so unmercifully?

"THE CATBIRD'S WHISTLE."

"An old bridge stood with dust thick strewn,
Where through a crooked country lane
A brook flowed down, and out again
Slow gurgling past with quiet croon;
While sunshine kissed the cool grey stones
And chequered every leaf and spray,
And shallows sang, in feeble tone,
Where pebbles in mosaic lay.

"And softly, from the deepest shade,
A catbird's whistle low and clear
Crept out as though the sound was made
For only Nature's listening ear;
Like dripping water falling slow
Round mossy rocks in music rare,
So, mellowed by the summer glow
The catbird's whistle echoed there.

"Far up along the short green sward
The white sheep nibbled at the grass,
And lightly, as the winds did pass
Would come the catbird's minor chord—
A call that made all others mute,
Soft thrilling thro' the drowsy air;
As some lost note from Orpheus' lute
So came the catbird's whistle there."

We must not close this brief notice without adding a word of thanks for the excellent way in which the printers and publishers have treated Poems.

NORMAN GALE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE are asked to state that the preparation of the New English Dictionary is being continued, statements to the contrary notwithstanding, on the lines originally laid down by the delegates of the Clarendon Press.

FROM the list of Birthday Honours we may extract the following: Prof. Max Müller, to be sworn a member of the Privy Council; Dr. J. G. Fitch (formerly of the Education Department) and Dr. P. le Page Renouf (late keeper of Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities at the British Museum) to be knighted; Mr. Clement R. Markham (president of the Royal Geographical Society) to be K.C.B.; and Mr. David Gill (Astronomer Royal at the Cape) to be C.B.

MR. SWINBURNE's new poem will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus next Thursday. It is described as being Malory's story of Balen, told in a somewhat elaborate rhymed measure, but with great closeness to the original.

THE project of publishing an index to the third series of Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, from 1830 to 1891—of which mention has before been made in the ACADEMY—is now advanced by a further stage. Messrs. P. S. King & Son, of Westminster, have engaged Miss Nancy Bailey, an expert in the subject, to compile the work, which is already well on its way in MS.; but it will not be put into print unless a sufficient number of subscribers come forward. The price is ten guineas for four thick volumes, uniform in size with the Debates. Adopting a suggestion made by Mr. Gladstone, it is intended to include in the index of subjects the historical declarations of statesmen—such as Lord Derby's "leap in the dark," John Bright's similes of "the Scotch terrier" and "the cave of Adullam," Sir James Graham's "Jack Cade legislation," and Disraeli's attack on Sir Robert Peel's Government as "an organised hypocrisy."

THE Cambridge University Press will publish immediately an edition of Suetonius, with historical introduction, commentary, appendices, &c., by Mr. Evelyn S. Shuckburgh, of Emmanuel College.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, Q.C., is about to publish through Messrs. Macmillan & Co. the popular lectures on the duties and liabilities of trustees which he recently delivered in the Inner Temple. His object is to bring out in bold relief the plain duties and equally plain liabilities of express trustees, in such a manner as to engage the attention alike of the student of our law and of the many people who though not lawyers are yet trustees.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. have nearly ready for publication an English translation of Herr Wilhelm Bousset's Der Antichrist, which was reviewed by Mr. F. C. Conybeare in the ACADEMY of October 19, 1895. The translator is Prof. A. H. Keane, author of the Ethnology recently issued in the "Cambridge Geographical Series." He has added explanatory and other notes, besides contributing a prologue on the Babylonian dragon myth.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have now in the press the first three volumes of "Harvard Historical Studies," which is to comprise works of original research selected from the writings of teachers and graduate students in the department of history and government in Harvard University, and also collections of documents, bibliographies, reprints of rare tracts, &c. The monographs will appear at irregular intervals, but it is hoped that at least three will be published annually. The first three volumes will be: The Suppression of the African Slave Trade to the United States of America, 1638-1870, by Dr. W. E. B. du Bois, professor in Wilberforce University; The Contest Over the Ratification of the Federal Constitution in Massachusetts, by S. B. Harding, assistant professor of history in Indiana University; and A Critical Study of Nullification in South Carolina, by D. F. Houston, professor of political economy in the University of Texas.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish immediately a new story by Mrs. Alexander, entitled A Winning Hazard.

MR. JOHN LANE has nearly ready for publication an angler's anthology, by Mr. John Buchan, to be entitled Musa Piscatrix, with six etched illustrations by Mr. R. Philip Pimlott.

THE next volume of Mr. Elkin Mathew's "Shilling Garland" will be Songs and Odes, by Canon Dixon, selected by Mr. Robert Bridges.

WITH reference to a recent discussion in the ACADEMY about Aucassin and Nicolette, we notice that Mr. Lang's version is priced at thirty dollars (£8) in the April catalogue of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons; and that a new translation is announced by Messrs. Copeland & Day, of Boston, the translator being Mr. M. S. Henry, with the passages in verse turned into English rhyme by Mr. E. W. Thompson.

A CHEAP edition of In a Conning Tower; or, How I took H.M.S. Majestic into Action, by Mr. H. O. Arnold Forster, is about to be issued at sixpence by Messrs. Cassell & Co., with the original illustrations by Mr. W. H. Overend, and a new preface by the author. This book has already passed through many editions in its more expensive form, and translations have appeared in French, Spanish, and Italian.

A CHEAP edition of Mr. Augustine Birrell's Res Judicatae will be published early in June by Mr. Elliot Stock, uniform with the re-issue of Obiter Dicta.

MESSRS. GARDNER, DARTON & Co. have now in hand a second edition of the volume of Addresses on Christian Socialism, by the Hon. and Rev. James Adderley, entitled Looking Upward; also a second edition of Work in Great Cities, by A. F. Winnington Ingram, rector of Bethnal Green; and a fourth edition of Canon Hammond's Church or Chapel.

THE June number of Blackwood's Magazine will contain an article on Cardinal Manning, bringing out the character of the ambitious and intriguing ecclesiastic, in contrast with the saintly and scholarly Newman.

MR. KARL BLIND will have an article in the June number of the New Review, on "The Duelling Craze," with personal recollections from his university days at Heidelberg and Bonn.

THE Académie Française has divided the Prix Gobert, for history, as follows: 9000 francs (£360) to M. Hanotaux (the Minister for Foreign Affairs) for his Cardinal Richelieu; and 1000 francs (£40) to M. Ernest Daudet (brother of M. Alphonse Daudet) for his work on La Vendée.

ON Monday of this week, Mr. George Petrie, F.S.A., a well-known bookseller of Dundee, was entertained at dinner by a number of friends, and presented with an address and a silver inkstand, on the occasion of his retiring from business. In a speech delivered by Mr. A. C. Lamb, author of Dundee: Its Quaint and Historic Buildings, an interesting history was given of former Dundee booksellers, including the father of Tom Hood and the founder of the firm of Mudie.

THE evening discourse at the Royal Institution on Friday next will be delivered by Mr. Augustine Birrell, his subject being "John Wesley: Some Aspects of the Eighteenth Century."

Corrigenda.—In Mr. Whitley Stokes's letter on "Lord Crawford's Irish Medical MS.," in the ACADEMY of May 16, 1896, p. 406, col. 2, l. 7, for an eighth read an eighth; p. 406, col. 3, l. 4, for a spice, read spices; p. 407, col. 1, l. 45, for piecoga read piecoga.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

PROF. F. Y. EDGEWORTH has been re-elected to the Drummond chair of political economy at Oxford, for a second term of five years.

THE financial board at Cambridge have submitted a report to the senate, recommending the purchase by the university of two sites in the town—one adjoining the Cavendish Laboratory and the New Museums, for £12,000; the other, being two acres of the park of Downing College, for £15,000. Towards the purchase money the syndics of the Pitt Press are prepared to advance £10,000.

THE full list of subscribers to the English lectureship fund at Cambridge, due to the enthusiastic importunity of Prof. Skeat, is published in the University Reporter. The total, up to Lady Day, is £1680, the interest on which will yield the required stipend of £50 for the two coming years. But a further capital sum of £150 is still needed, in order to make up this amount permanently. In the list of subscribers it is interesting to find the names of the late T. H. Huxley and the late Lord Leighton, as well as those of Lord Tennyson and Sir E. Burne-Jones.

IN pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of representatives of colleges, held at Cambridge last March, dates have been fixed for the examinations for entrance scholarships during next year. Trinity and St. John's will each hold a separate examination in the first week of November. A fortnight later six colleges—Pembroke, Oriel, King's, Jesus, Christ's and Emmanuel—combine for a joint examination, on which no less than forty-eight scholarships and exhibitions may be awarded. In December, Peterhouse and Sidney will combine; and, in the same week, Clare and Trinity Hall. We notice that five colleges offer scholarships in history; two in modern languages, and two in Hebrew; and one (John's) in Sanskrit, one (Downing) in law, and one (St. Catharine's) in theology.

AT the examination for Part I. of the mathematical tripos, which began on Tuesday, there are only seventy-five candidates, as compared with 110 last year. The final list of wranglers, &c., will be published on June 16.

IN connexion with the teachers' training syndicate at Cambridge, Prof. Foster Watson, of Aberystwith, was to deliver two lectures on Thursday and Friday of this week, on "The Teaching of English Literature and Composition"; while Mrs. Sophie Bryant, of the North London Collegiate School for Girls, will on Saturday next deliver a lecture on "Freedom and Order in School Discipline."

AT a meeting of the Oxford Philological Society, to be held in Oriel common room on Friday next, Mr. A. C. Clark, of Queen's, will read a paper on "The Madrid MS. of Asconius and Valerius Flaccus, and a Paris MS. of the Letters to Atticus."

MR. EDWARD F. STRANGE, sub-librarian to the National Art Library at South Kensington, will deliver a lecture in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford on Saturday next upon "Japanese Colour Prints."

THE subject of the next dissertation for the Greek prize at Oxford, to be awarded in 1899, is "The Reciprocal Relations of Morals and Metaphysics."

IN convocation at Oxford next Tuesday, it will be proposed that Clarendon Press books to the value of £100 be given to the free public library in the new municipal buildings at Oxford; and also that books to the value of £25 be given to the ten following free public libraries—Tottenham, Leyton, Poplar, Southwark, Oswestry, Rugby, Chesterfield, Lincoln, Colchester, and Smethwick.

THE Hon. F. W. D. Smith has accepted the office of treasurer of King's College, London.

THE council of Firth College, Sheffield, intend to appoint a professor of English language and literature for the session beginning next October. Candidates must send in their applications before June 10.

SILENCE.

Be still: the crown of life is silentness.
Give thou a quiet hour to each long day.
Too much of time we spend in profitless
And foolish talk—too little do we say.

If thou wouldst gather words that shall avail,
Learning a wisdom worthy to express,
Leave for a while thy chat and empty tale—
Study the golden speech of silentness.

ARTHUR L. SALMON.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

IN the May number of the Antiquary Mr. MacRitchie continues the interesting diary of his ancestor, the Rev. William MacRitchie, relating to his travels in England, which took place in 1795. The Scottish minister looked upon Liverpool as an "extensive and opulent town," but found most of the streets by no means wide, though there were a few "elegant squares." He speaks of the docks as "the greatest thing to be seen here, or perhaps anywhere else." He also paid a visit to Manchester, which does not seem to have impressed him so much as Liverpool. He saw the collegiate church, which he regarded as "a superb piece of Gothic architecture." It is curious to notice, as his editor points out, that he anticipated events by speaking of it as the Cathedral. Had a similar slip been made by a medieval chronicler, how it would have exercised the antiquaries of the present day? The Rev. A. G. B. Atkinson produces some entries from the record-books of St. Botolph-without-Aldgate. None of them are very important, but it is well that they should be preserved by means of the printing-press. It seems that in 1584 the rule that those who intended to receive the Holy Communion should give notice to the curate had not become a dead letter; for that curate whose name was Robert Heaze, gave warning to all concerned that he required them to let him know of their intention the night before the sacrament was to be administered. The primary object may have been that he might know how much bread and wine to provide; but we apprehend that another motive was, that an accurate list of Protestant Nonconformists and Popish Recusants might be compiled for the use of the authorities. That these persons were not permitted to go their own way in peace is proved by an entry of the year 1589, where we read, under December the 11th, that "A court [was] kept in ower church by the Chancellor of London to reforme suche as had not receyved the Comunion for the Easter tyme." Mr. D. Alleyne Walter continues his paper on the old ornamental ironwork still existing in Dublin. The examples he gives, though not of a high degree of excellence, show far superior taste to much that is produced nowadays.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THREE UNPUBLISHED PICTISH INSCRIPTIONS.

Bodleian Library, Oxford: May 11, 1896.

The three following inscriptions were unknown to me until after my Vernacular Inscriptions of the Ancient Kingdom of Alban had been published. I was told of the first two by Lord Southesk, and of the third by Prof. Rhys. I describe them from large photographs.

The first two are on stones which are now at Doune Lodge, in the possession of Mr. A. Winter, whom I have to thank for much information respecting them. Doune Lodge is the Earl of Moray's seat, near the station of Doune, between Stirling and Callander. The name of the parish is Kilmadock—i.e., Church of St. Madoc.

The first stone was found in the Annet burn (close to Doune Lodge), about two hundred yards above its junction with the Teith, and consequently close to the site of the old church of St. Madoc. It is a boundary-stone of two tenements belonging to that church, and lying one behind the other. One side has nothing cut on it. The inscription on the other would be expressed in our own alphabet as follows:

Y Y+ UCULIE
N
Y Y AAIHTA

The cross at top means that the Church was owner. The two feathered arrows to its left are pointers showing the direction of the first tenement (compare the similar pointer on the Lunasting Stone). Then follows the name of the first occupier, U Culien—i.e., grandson or descendant of Culian: the sculptor was unable to get the final letter into the line above. After a considerable space comes the name of the second occupier O Tuit—i.e., grandson or descendant of Tot, followed by two more pointers, and the words a aihla, "his hearth-side."

The following linguistic explanations may be offered. In ancient Irish we have both o and u as "descendant," and here we seem to have them side by side, though it is just doubtful whether the o is not u. I have spoken of the names as those of the occupiers; but the Pictish practice was to call property by the name of its past or present occupier (as if we were to call a farm not Johnson's but Johnson), and I suspect that the u and o in U Culien and O Tuit are locatives: they are equally correct as such. Culien is a correct genitive of Culian, O.Ir. for "whelp" (see Stokes, Urkelt. Sprachschatz, p. 94). Tot, the ancestor of O Tuit, was doubtless an ecclesiastic named Fot ("cautious," "fearful," or "shy"), and as such had the honorific prefix Tu, To, or Do attached to his name. But that prefix aspirates a following consonant, so that the latter part of his name would begin with Fh, and fh is absolutely silent in Gaelic; moreover, before a vowel or fh, tu, to, do became simply t (see instances in Windisch). Consequently his name became T'Fhot, pronounced Tot, with gen. T'Fhuit, pronounced Tuit—and all Pictish inscriptions are written phonetically. That name is a good example of the difficulties of Old Gaelic etymology to a beginner. As for a ihta, it would be in modern Highland a aite, pronounced (at least in some parts) a aihle. Aihle is intermediate between the ahta of the Carden Moor ("Logie Elphinstone") Stone, and the ahte (= ahte) of the larger Conningsburgh fragment.

The writing is in half-uncials of the Northumbrian type. The A is always A, the C is C, the E is C with a tag below it, the H is h, the U is U. To this last form I have found no parallel. There are plenty of u's shaped like y, and plenty of u's with a tag at the bottom of the right side, but no round u's with a tag in the centre. And this singularity leads me to attribute the writing to a period of which we have few examples—in other words, to put it as early as possible.

I doubt if this inscription is quite as old as the Carden Moor Ogam inscription; but I am confident that it is seventh century, and that it is the oldest piece of Highland Gaelic existing in any form of the Roman alphabet. It is also the most southerly Pictish inscription yet known.

The second stone was found in another stream, the Coillechat burn, about two miles west of the former. It was found about two miles above the burn's junction with the Teith—consequently, I suppose, not far from the site of an ancient chapel shown by the Ordnance Map on the west bank of the burn. It has in one corner a cross, followed by the Ogams

This is the most westerly Pictish inscription yet known. The rest of the stone, or a great part of it, contains a ground plan, in which (as well as ordinary boundary-lines) a long line of trees or underwood is figured, a well (two small concentric circles), and another boundary-stone (a cross). No doubt this property also belonged to the monastery of St. Madoc, which had a number of chapels in the parish. I doubt if the form ahtc is later than seventh century.

I am not aware whether map-stones were previously known in Scotland; but I have long felt certain that the celebrated cup-marked stones there found are nothing but maps of interments in the neighbouring soil—an explanation which, so far as I know, has not been previously given.

The third stone is at Greenloaning, Perthshire; and I have to thank the Rev. John Scott, the minister, for much information regarding it, as well as for transcripts and for helping me to get it photographed. He tells me that it "is situated at the edge of a small roundel of trees in the centre of a large field on the farm of Townhead, estate of Keir (Mr. Archibald Stirling, proprietor). The farm lies on the north side of the Ochills, but on the south side of the main road, between Dunblane and Blackford, and about 300 yards south of Greenloaning Church."

The top of the stone has lines, straight and diagonal, cut on it, so that here also we seem

II
VURCAMUBONO+NO

The marks at the top are, of course, arrows, used as pointers to show the direction of the tenements, but the feathering of them is at right angles to the shaft.* The inscription below them is in Roman capitals; but the lower line (which is far beneath the upper) is much more carelessly cut, and I see no crossbar to the A in it; consequently I believe it to have been cut at a different time.

In the top line the first word is BVAH,† phonetic spelling for buath, an extended form of the Irish both, "cottage": cf. the parallel forms bóchail and biachail. Next comes QATT, which is the name of the property derived from its past or present occupier Qatt, and put in the locative-dative case; then IDON, "that is"; and, finally, ATT= "hearthside," the I and T being joined so as to form the cross usual on march-stones of church property. Ait, of course, is the same word as aite: the two exist side by side in modern Highland. The reason for explaining that the buath was an ait is probably that the occupier of an ait (or "hearth" of his own) possessed legal or customary privileges, such as freedom from ejectment, so long as he paid his dues to the lord of the soil.

The second line begins with the name of a second tenement lying behind the first. This name VURCAMU is, of course, the name of an occupier put in the locative-dative case. The name of the occupier was Uurohama, "Very brave." Uur- is a well-known prefix in Pictish personal names, and the use of c for ch persisted at least as late as the twelfth-century entries in the Book of Deer.

The rest of the line consists of the words BONOIT NO, the it being again joined so as to form a cross, and the stem of the t also serving as the first stroke of the following n (a kind of ligature of which there are two examples on the Shevack or "Newton" Stone). BONOIT is modern bunait, "foundation," "dwelling"; ai is often written oi in O. Ir. (Zeuss, p. 30); and modern bun appears as Pictish bonn in the Scoonie and Dyke ("Brodie") inscriptions, which have bavonn for babhun—the stem is really bon- not bun- (see Stokes, Urkelt. Spr., p. 177). NO is Ir. no, "new" (O'Reilly); modern Highland has nodha and nomha, as well as nuadh (Ir. nuie, nua, nuadh, nuagh).

The meaning of the second line is consequently "Uurohama(s): new settlement (or, new dwelling)." That the line refers to a distinct tenement, and not to that mentioned in the previous line, is clear from the great space put between the two lines; and that the second tenement was one sliced out of the first, and at a later time, is evidenced by the word "new," and the fact that the second line is cut by a different hand from the first.

I doubt if any part of the inscription was cut before the tenth century.

E. W. B. NICHOLSON.

* As in the Danish Northumbrian coin (of about 944?) figured in the Brit. Mus. Cat. of A.-S. coins, vol. 1, pl. xxviii, No. 9.

† Mr. W. A. Craigie's transcript (sent to Prof. Rhys) and Mr. Scott's (sent to me) agree in giving bovah, which would be phonetic for bo-bhath ("cow-hut," fr. bo and Ir. bath, aspirated to bhath in composition). But Mr. Scott's rubbing does not show an e; the photograph has only a small e (or rather an 8), so faintly outlined that it seems to be a merely accidental mark in the stone; and Prof. Rhys, who has since seen the stone, agrees with me on this point.

‡ From an earlier novio-s, novio-s (Stokes, p. 193). With novio-s and no cf. tovo and Ir. tu, to (id., p. 134).

There is also a very enlightening note on hyl in this division of Llyud's folio: "Bil, 'the mouth'; hence in Cardiganshire and elsewhere Bil is the mouth of a vessel. 'Kuppan laun hyd y tyl,' &c." Lower down is found "[Obsecl. Welsh] Bil, 'a mouth,' Ir. Béul, [Obsecl. Ir.] Bél," (I should explain that Llyud writes u for w.)

May I just add a line with reference to Mr. Joseph Jacobs's careful note to the Cornish "Tale of Ivan" in his Celtic Fairy Tales? Mr. Jacobs does not seem to have been aware that that fine story is printed (with due acknowledgment that it is taken from Llyud's Archæologia) in Trysorfa Gwybodaeth (Carmarthen, 1770). The proverbial saying quoted in Borrow's Wild Wales may probably be thus accounted for.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "CHUM."

King's College, London: May 16, 1896.

Many may have read with great interest Prof. Skeat's suggestion to derive "chum" from the Low-German student term Kump, a familiar form of Kumpan, itself a derivative of the pretty Old French compainz (Latin cum "with," and panem "bread").

As regards this word, whose accusative alone has, as usual, survived in literary French, under the form of compagnon, an error seems to have crept in; and, as it is contained in such a masterpiece as the New English Dictionary, it is important that it should not be left unnoticed.

The New English Dictionary tells us, s.v. compans, as Prof. Skeat says, that the French compain is "now a schoolboy word meaning chum."

The word used in French schools is not compain, but copain, which is exactly the equivalent—and, according to the present suggestion, the father—of our word "chum."

VICTOR SPIERS.

Brighton: May 18, 1896.

The etymology of "chum" given by Prof. Skeat from the Bremer Wörterbuch of 1767 seems very probable. I may add that I have heard the word "Kamerad"—which has the same meaning as "Kumpan"—always pronounced "Kumerad" in the Franco-German folk-speech of Baden and the Rhenish Palatinate. That dialect stands midway between Low German and High German. As to the argument drawn from the former English spelling of "Churfürst," it is not applicable. This spelling of "Kurfürst" with a "Ch" is an old German one, which, in official documents, has lingered on into quite recent times. From German it was taken over into English orthography.

SCIENCE.

From the French of Auguste Brachet. Re-written and enlarged by Paget Toynbee. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

BRACHET's book has done good work in its time by popularising some of the French portions of Diez' Grammar, but it sadly required bringing up to date. This task, by no means an easy one, has been accomplished with much skill and evidence of scholarship by Mr. Paget Toynbee, who had shown his qualification for it by his previously published Specimens of Old French—a work that has been well spoken of by some of the leading scholars on the Continent.

One of the best features of Brachet's Grammar, as well as of his Dictionary, is the clear and methodical way in which the facts are presented; and we are glad to see that Mr. Toynbee has adhered to his original in this respect. As great strides have been made—chiefly in our knowledge of phonetics—since Diez' day, this is the section to which Mr. Toynbee has principally devoted his attention. In the second edition of the late Prof. Schwan's Grammar he had a guide which contains, so far as Old French phonetics and flexions are concerned, practically all the latest information; and he has availed himself of this and other books with much judgment (although we sometimes note a tendency to make light of difficulties, as where we are told that lui comes from **illui*, and no attempt is made to explain the Latin form by analogy). He has also consulted with advantage scattered articles that have not yet been methodically grouped: thus, the value of the chapter on the formation of adverbs is greatly enhanced by an extract from one of Prof. Tobler's "Vermischte Beiträge." For some unaccountable reason Brachet and other grammarians have ignored the claims of Syntax to rank on a level with Phonetics and Flexions as a portion of their science. Mr. Toynbee could not, of course, be expected to fill up so wide a gap; but he has done the next best thing by calling in the aid of Syntax, with more success than Brachet had done, wherever it was necessary for the explanation of points with which he had to deal. In this way, and in this way only, is it possible to give a satisfactory account of oui, toujours, and other words. We remark, by the way, that voici and voilà are still explained as imperatives; whereas we know it to be held by at least one eminent scholar that the Old French forms of these words, ves-ci and ves-là, show them to be present indicatives, used interrogatively to express command, as is often the case. For our part, we would have preferred to see the authorities, with references, given for the discoveries that have been made since Diez, at any rate in the case of such important general laws as that called after Darmesteter. Probably Mr. Toynbee thought—and in this he may be right—that beginners are satisfied with having the results of the researches put before them, without troubling about the books or periodicals that contain the original discussions. The principal merit of the present editor is that he has, throughout, made a more extended and intelligent use of Middle Latin and Old French than his predecessor had done, thus materially adding to the value of the Grammar from the scientific point of view.

This is one of the books which should be in the hands of every Modern Sixth boy, nor can there be any doubt that the study of French would be rendered far more attractive to the members of the upper classical forms too, if the intimate relations existing between this tongue and the Latin, to which they devote so much attention, were pointed out to them. We are convinced that the historical teaching of modern languages in our schools would soon bear fruit. We should have more boys going up for the tripos at Cambridge; and English scholarship would, at no distant period, be freed from the stigma now resting on it, of having produced a comparatively small number of men that have furthered the scientific study of their own language and literature, and practically none—Mr. Toynbee forms one of the very few exceptions—who have thought it worth while to explore the mass of literature that was produced on the Continent during the Middle Ages.

THE AMERICAN ORIENTAL SOCIETY'S MEETING.

We quote the following from the New York Nation:

Andover Hill: April 11, 1896.

"At the recent Congress of Orientalists in London, Prof. Cowell, of Cambridge, the president of the Aryan section, opened its sessions with some graceful verses, first in Sanskrit, and then in English, as follows:

'Calm in calm woods the ancient Rishis sat,
 Soothing their souls with friendship's converse high—
 While we, my honoured friends, by evil fate, Meet where the city's ceaseless din rolls by.'

And he consoled us with the thought that 'contrast brings new harmonies to light.' Well, here we were as little disturbed by the din of the traffic that surges through Piccadilly as were the calm Hindu hermits, and we needed no such consolation. Andover is an ideal place of meeting for a learned society, and especially for our Oriental Society, whose earliest history is closely associated with 'The Hill.' For Andover may be justly called the cradle of Oriental learning in America. The names of Moses Stuart and Edward Robinson—famous Andover names, famed, withal, far beyond Andover—stand beside that of our founder, John Pickering, on the first list of our officers of considerably more than half a century ago. Indeed, the temper of cheerful reminiscence was quite pervading. It was to the house of Moses Stuart that its present occupant, Prof. Harris, welcomed us on Thursday; and it was the old home of Austin Phelps in which Prof. Moore received us on Friday. The charming inn in which—sociable and unscattered—we lodged, just opposite the Campus, was once the home of Harriet Beecher Stowe, and was fitted up for her occupancy with the first seven hundred dollars of the proceeds of Uncle Tom's Cabin. But let no one think from all this that the aforesaid cradle has been consigned to the dusty attic of reminiscence. Whoever examined Prof. Moore's masterly piece of work, his Commentary on the Book of Judges, just issued, and heard the papers of his friend and assistant, Dr. Torrey, will doubtless admit that that piece of furniture is still rocking in a very lively manner, and that there is no present fear of the nursery lapsing into unwholesome quiet.

"President Gilman, who had given the society much faithful service from the fifties to the seventies, is now our presiding officer; and it is pleasant to record the faithfulness with which—in spite of his duties on the Venezuelan Commission—he took the long journey from Baltimore in order to be present. Some societies suffer under the régime of the merely ornamental or figure-head type of president; but we are fortunate in having a man to preside who can efficiently help us to the smooth and ready dispatch of the business in hand. The attendance was good. The members number between three and four hundred, including many residing in distant parts of this country, and many abroad. About one-tenth of these were present, besides many intelligently interested auditors from the Seminary and the town. Johns Hopkins was represented by its president and by Haupt; Columbia, by Gottheil and Jackson; Yale, by Hopkins, the successor of Prof. Whitney; Harvard, by Toy, Lyon, and Lanman; and so on.

"This was our one hundred and seventh meeting. The sessions began on Thursday, and continued without drag, and yet without hurry, until Saturday noon. The purpose of this arrangement is to give opportunity for two informal evening sessions. This present arrangement of annual meetings extending over three days is a most palpable improvement over the old plan of two extremely brief semi-annual meetings, where the need of 'hustling' and 'catching trains' quite overcrowded the scholar's spirit. President Gilman set the business session for Friday morning. This began with the presentation of correspondence by the corresponding secretary, Prof. Lanman. Notable among these letters was one from a distant corner of Assam, in India—from Sibagar on the Brahmaputra. It was written by Mr. Peal of the Royal Geographical Society, who is at work on the languages of that region, and contained a request for a certain publication of the society upon those tongues by one of our earliest members, the Rev. Nathan Brown, a missionary of the Baptist Union. 'Its [the book's] value to us here,' says Mr. Peal, 'is much greater than you might suppose. Dr. Brown was a real genius.' A recent letter, bearing the signature, still clear and firm, of Otto Boettlingk of the Russian Imperial Academy, the Nestor of all Sanskritists and the oldest honorary member of our society (he was elected in 1844), combines with frequent brochures from his pen to attest the unexhausted vitality of this distinguished octogenarian. Prof. Bühler of Vienna sends a stately publication of the Austrian Academy dedicated to the memory of our Whitney, and tells of the progress of his Encyclopædia of Indic Philology, to be issued by Trübner of Strassburg, the publisher of Paul's Germanic, Groeber's Romance, and Geiger's Iranian Philology, and to be executed on the same plan with those works. It is of interest to us because two of our members, Bloomfield and Lanman, have a hand in it. Dr. Johnston of Ballykilbeg, co. Down, formerly of the Bengal Civil Service, makes the welcome announcement that he has translated Doussin's System des Vedanta, and that it is to run through the Calcutta Review and then appear in book form. Dr. Burgess, of Edinburgh, formerly Director-General of the Archaeological Survey of India, gives an encouraging account of the progress of his great work (already noticed in these columns), soon to be issued by Griggs of London. The first portfolio of 150 or more colotype plates of the most important archaeological remains in India may soon be expected. They are made from the best of some three or four thousand negatives at Whitehall and the Calcutta Museum, and the negatives are selected by an unexcelled expert. Of interest to serious students of Buddhism is a letter from the well-known Subhuti, a Buddhist high-priest of Ceylon, stating his readiness to comply with a request for a transcript of certain Pali texts of the Sacred Canon. Finally, Lal Chandra Vidya Bhaskara of Jodhpur, Rajputana, sends us, in superb calligraphy, a most elaborate Life of Prof. Whitney, done into Sanskrit verses from the obituary notice of that scholar which appeared in the Nation of June 14, 1894.

"The necrology of the year included some very notable names. Among them is that of Prof. Roth, of Tübingen, the life-long friend and fellow-labourer of Whitney in the field of Vedic research. Another is Roet, the librarian of the India Office in London, whom scores of grateful scholars have risen up to call blessed for his learning and for the kindness with which he put that learning at their disposal. Of our illustrious countryman, Dr. Van Dyck, the great Arabist, we need not speak, unless for the pride and joy that we have in calling his noble life and life-work to remembrance. Two men long distinguished in other walks of life, the late Hon. Charles Theodore Russell, of Cambridge, and the Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, of New York, were for very many years faithful and interested members of the society.

"The treasurer, Mr. Warren of Cambridge, showed a satisfactory balance-sheet; and the committee of publication announced that a new half volume had been issued a few days before. New blood was infused into the society by the election of a goodly number of new members. The old administrative officers were re-elected, with one exception; the secretary, Prof. Lanman, after nearly twenty years of such labour, desired to be relieved, and in his stead was elected Prof. Hopkins. On the other hand, the healthy growth of the society has greatly increased the amount of editorial labour to be done, and this labour had come, by prescription, to attach to the post of secretary. To effect a much needed redistribution of burdens, the directors appointed, accordingly, Profs. Lanman and Moore to serve as responsible editors of the Journal.

"Of the miscellaneous business only two items need be mentioned. One was an invitation from the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, to co-operate with them in the effort to establish a school of Oriental Study and Research in Bible Lands, somewhat after the manner of the American Schools at Athens and Rome. Prof. Thayer of Harvard submitted the draft of a plan. The other was a scheme for promoting the Historical Study of Religions, and emanated from Prof. Jastrow of Philadelphia.

"The papers presented were about thirty in number. They were, of course, largely technical. One of the most striking things about them was the largeness of the number that attempted a reappraisal of wholly diverse phases of ancient civilisation. Thus, Dr. Casanowicz discussed the Alexander legends in Talmud and Midrash with reference to Greek and Assyrian parallels. Prof. Macdonald's paper on the place of al-Ghazali in the theology of Islam adverted to the influence exerted by Buddhism upon one of the forms of Sufism. Prof. Jackson's paper upon Persian names in the Book of Esther, as well as that of his colleague, Prof. Gottheil, upon references to Zoroaster in the Syriac literature, brought out still other interlacings of Aryan and Semitic life. And again, Mr. Edmunds's essay on the compilation of the Pali Canon was the fruit of studies which were suggested to him by his study of the history of the New Testament Canon under Prof. Rendel Harris. Dr. Scott's paper upon Malayan words in English was a brief account of a most elaborate investigation. In the course of it he used the expression, 'If there is any longer any such work as an English dictionary.' If, indeed! Our vocabulary is already fairly flooded with words of the cosmopolitan jargon. His essay showed, perhaps more clearly than any of those just mentioned, how infinite is the interplay between races and nations, how impossible to study any of them in isolation. And yet how short is the time since scholars began to realise that they could not understand the origin of Greek civilisation from the Grecian monuments of that civilisation alone!

"Apropos of a technical discussion of a passage in Ezra, Prof. Haupt expressed a view long held by him that Assyrian is only an older local variety of Aramaic. In his paper on Genesis ii. 6, 'There went up a mist (edh) from the earth,' &c., he assumed on the part of the Palestinian narrator a misunderstanding of the old Babylonian material worked over by him, in which material the loan-word edh had reference to the system of irrigation practised in Babylonia. Prof. Haupt's pupil, Dr. Johnston, sent a valuable paper on the epistolary literature of the Assyro-Babylonians. These letters are original, contemporaneous, and authentic documents for the history of their times. Noteworthy among them are the letters between Bel-ibni, the general of Ashurbanipal, and his royal master. They are pervaded by cordial good feeling and soldier-like frankness, and are rich in historical allusions and details. How wonderful that we should now possess the letters—still clear in tone and fresh in colouring—to and from a king who only a little while ago was to us the half-mythical Sardanapalus!

"Prof. Bloomfield sent an advance report of the results of his Atharva-Veda studies, now publishing in Max Müller's Sacred Books of the East. And a printed specimen of the late Prof. Whitney's translation of the same Veda was laid before the society by Prof. Lanman, who is now bringing out that work in his 'Harvard Oriental Series.' The latter's studies of the relative age of different parts of the Rig-Veda have been continued by Prof. Arnold of the University College of North Wales, Bangor, who sent us an elaborate treatise on that subject. And a critical investigation of the eighth book of the Rig-Veda, conducted with a similar purpose, was presented by Prof. Hopkins. It is interesting to see at such a meeting as this how like in method is the criticism of the Vedas to that of the Bible, differ as they may in details. For this reason, if for no other, it would be a pity to divide the society into two sections, a Semitic and an Aryan. The meeting was a thoroughly harmonious one—no odium philologorum. It was altogether happy and profitable, and full of promise for the future of the society. The next meeting is appointed to be held at Baltimore, in Easter week, April 22-24, 1897."

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE anniversary meeting of the Linnean Society, for the election of president and council, will be held at Burlington House, on Monday next, at 3 p.m.

AT an extra meeting of the Chemical Society, to be held at Burlington House on Thursday next, the Lothar Meyer Memorial Lecture will be delivered by Prof. P. Phillips Bedson.

AT the Royal Institution on Tuesday next, the Rev. Prof. T. G. Bonney will deliver the first of two lectures on "The Building and Sculpture of Western Europe."

THE Institution of Civil Engineers has appointed a committee to consider the question of the definition of a standard, or standards, of thermal efficiency for steam-engines.

THE annual visitation of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, will take place on Saturday, June 6.

WE understand that the Emperor of Germany and the Czar of Russia have each accepted a copy of Mr. R. Kearton's recent work on British Birds Nests, illustrated from photographs taken direct from nature by Mr. O. Kearton. So great has been the demand for the work that Messrs. Cassell & Co. have already reprinted it.

THE discourse which Dr. E. Frankland recently delivered at the Royal Institution, on "The Past, Present, and Future Water-Supply of London," is printed in the May number of Science Progress. We quote his conclusion:

"I have shown that the Thames basin can furnish an ample supply for fifty or more years to come, while the quality of the spring and deep-well waters and of the filtered river water would be unimpeachable. To secure these benefits for the future, storage must be gradually provided for 11 500 millions of flood water judiciously selected in the Thames valley, and a proportionate volume in the basin of the Lea; while filtration must be carried to its utmost perfection, by the use of finer sand than is at present employed, and by the maintenance of a uniform rate during the twenty-four hours."

In the same number of Science Progress Mr. F. E. Beddard gives a summary of recent literature on the Oligochaeta, or earth-worms, since the publication of his own monograph by the Clarendon Press; Mr. Alexander Scott similarly reviews recent research on the relative atomic weights of hydrogen and oxygen; and Mr. G. C. Bourne continues his statement of the present position of the cell-theory.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

DR. E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, keeper of the Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities at the British Museum, will on Saturday next deliver the first of two lectures at the Royal Institution, on "The Moral and Religious Literature of Ancient Egypt."

We understand that about one half of the sum required (£6300) to purchase the late Prince L.-L. Bonaparte's linguistic collection for the Guildhall Library has now been promised. Among the city companies that have contributed are—the Goldsmiths, the Fishmongers, the Carpenters, the Armourers and Braziers, the Cordwainers, the Clock-makers, the Wax Chandlers, and the Stationers. Dr. Butler, the master of Trinity, has recently joined the committee. The treasurer of the fund is Lord Aldenham, and the hon. secretary is the corporation librarian at Guildhall.

THE REV. WENTWORTH WEBSTER has printed (Bayonne: Lamsignère) the first twenty-nine pages of the MS. Latin-Basque Dictionary, by Pierre d'Urte, preserved at Shirburn Castle—the Earl of Macclesfield's seat in Oxfordshire—together with the Basque translation of the Old Testament, which was edited two years ago by the Rev. Llewelyn Thomas in the series of "Anecdota Oxoniensis." An account of this Dictionary has already been given in the Revue de Linguistique (July, 1893). It consists of no less than five volumes, each of about 500 pages, but yet does not go further than the Latin word commotus. Quite apart from its value in preserving Basque words, formations, and idioms, it is of some interest even to classical scholars. For the original Latin work that Pierre d'Urte must have had before him was not a dictionary proper, but a medieval phrase-book for instruction in writing and speaking Latin. Mr. Webster has been unable to discover this original; but he remarks that it contains, among many other examples of Low Latinity, the word abannatus, which is not to be found in Ducange, though the substantive abannatio is there. These twenty-five pages, transcribed from the MS. by Mr. Llewelyn Thomas, are printed as a specimen, in order to try whether the learned world will afford encouragement to the publication of the whole of the five volumes.

MR. EDWARD SPENCER DODGSON—who is indefatigable in putting into type out-of-the-way fragments of Basque literature—has recently published (Alençon: Renant De Broise) the second part of a treatise entitled The Basque Verb Found and Determined, which consists of a concordance to the 219 forms of the Basque verb employed in the Epistles to Timothy, in Leicarraga's "Testamenta Berria" (1571). He hopes to go on and collect all the verbal forms used by Leicarraga, and thus provide the student with a complete inventory—from what is practically the oldest authority for the Basque language—of the radicals that apply the passion or action of the verb to the rest of the sentence.

MR. SPENCER DODGSON has also printed (Bayonne: Lesgourgues) a leaflet of four pages, containing the 254 Basque verbal forms employed in the Proverbes-Basques-Espagnols of 1596, lately published by M. Van Eys. To these he has added the Basque vocabulary of Marinaeus Siculus, from the Spanish edition of 1539.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPERE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, April 25.)

MRS. L. M. GRIFFITHS in the Chair.—Mr. L. M. Griffiths gave a summary of the facts connecting William Herbert and Mary Fitton with the Sonnets, and showed portraits of the latter taken from the Fitton monument at Gawsworth, near Macclesfield.—Mr. Leo H. Grindon, in a paper on "The Shaksperian Sonnets," said, that if these incomparable verses seem sometimes obscure on first perusal, this is a failing common to all in art that is great and immortal, and the veritable want is probably a quicker intelligence on our part. Permeated with passion, packed into the narrowest possible compass, nowhere in poetry, either ancient or modern, have we a greater number of exquisite illustrations of deep feeling set forth in fashion more felicitous. Occasionally, perhaps, quaint and conceited, the blemishes in these transcendently beautiful Sonnets, if blemishes they really are, altogether dissolve and disappear in the presence of their noble qualities. It may be conceded, too, that at times there are indications of a weak and erring emotional and moral nature. Never mind. There were specks, no doubt, upon the golden apples of the Hesperides. In contemplating illustrious work of any description—yes, any kind of faithful and exemplary work—let us deal as we do with one another in everyday life, be sure that we recognise and appreciate all the good before wasting time upon the imperfections. There cannot be much to condemn in the utterances of one who for nearly three centuries has been thankfully quoted by statesmen, philosophers, and divines; whose tales have wound round thousands of honest hearts, and moistened thousands of pure eyes; whose pictures have awakened the most virtuous of sympathies, and whose wit has gladdened and revived the downcast when other appeals have been in vain. Although some of them seem to relate to a woman, probably the 'dark and dangerous Mary Fitton,' yet it was clearly a man who was always most present to the poet's fancy. All creative imagination is suffused with a feminine element and coloured by it. All great poetry is imbued with a yearning tenderness a vague but at the same time an insatiable sensibility to what is softest and sweetest—in one word, to the beau idéal presented bodily and spiritually in "heaven's last, best gift." So that, although it is in love that the vital energy of the poems mainly resides, there is nothing inconsistent or unnatural in the subject being masculine. The poet's function is to etherealise the facts of actual life, to transform the common things of existence into fairy marvels, no matter what may be the particular circumstance he takes for his text: that which we have to contemplate is the emotion suggested by it or born of it. The Sonnets are, in a measure, more instructive than the dramas in regard to the author's own inmost nature, since he here addresses the world more immediately in his own personal character. They are the most direct disclosures we have left us of his own actual thoughts and feelings. All true poetry is from within, not from without. Invited by external things, still it is oradled in the soul. The Sonnets of later date belong to the highest poetry of their kind, because the author had then acquired the habit of writing upon a subject undramatic. Whether it be clearly proved or disproved that the man addressed was William Herbert, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, matters little. It could not alter in the slightest degree the meaning or feeling of a single line. Among other beauties in the Sonnets may be noticed that here Shakspeare shows that, if he but touches the wild flowers of the hedgerows and meadows, like the statue of Memnon, when caressed by the rising sun, they begin to utter sweet music. (See Sonnets 54 and 99.) In the choicest poetry of our own age charming echoes from the Sonnets may be found—especially in the writings of Tennyson and Christina Rossetti.—Mr. J. W. Mills, in a former paper on "Venus and Adonis" (ACADEMY, May 2), had said, in reference to the artistic instincts of the epoch of Spenser and Shakspeare, that the intellectual activity of the Puritans was negative and destructive only; and that Milton, having received the highest classic culture, could not be instanced as an example of Puritan productiveness. Continuing this line of thought, Mr. Mills, in a paper entitled "How far was Milton a Puritan?" now reviewed the incidents of the poet's earlier years, referring to his education at St. Paul's and at Cambridge, and his years of retirement and study previous to making the "grand tour," a time spent, according to Puritan notions, in occupations evil, unhallowed, and godless. His writings furnish sufficient proof of his admiration for the stage, English and Greek, the very abomination of desolation for all honest Puritan souls. Other sources of Milton's inspiration were Chaucer, the gorgeous poetry of Tasso and Ariosto, ecclesiastical architecture, and religious music. Of culture such as this among orthodox Puritans there was and could be none. While Milton went heartily with the Puritans upon such questions as Church government and doctrines, taxation, republicanism, the rights of the subject, the freedom of the press, he was not even a Puritan in social customs, and the whole course of his intellectual life was one flagrant antithesis to, and an absolute negation of, all Puritanical conceptions of education. The scholarly allusions, the splendid thoughts, the wondrous style which embellish his work, were all derived from sources forbidden to the Puritan. The aims and ideals of Puritanism, whether intellectual, political, or religious, were alike all pre-doomed to utter failure. An endeavour to find out the quality and quantity of Puritan literature proves the first point. The political ideal of Puritanism, their notorious "commonwealth," or republic, was from its very inception but a mere military despotism of the most oppressive and stringent order, by which personal liberty was to be crushed out. The failure of Puritanism as a religious force is yet more appalling. It prepared the way for the flood of vice, irreligion, and lewdness, which, being as great in the first year of Charles II.'s reign as in the last, is a manifest and irrefragable proof that this amazing deterioration in the national character was antecedent to the Stuart Restoration, not a subsequent reflex consequence of Court profligacy. Nemo repente fuit turpissimus. Nor did the terrible results of Puritanism end with the debauchery of the English nation. In an indirect manner, and as a secondary cause, it was in no small degree contributory to some of the worst horrors of the French Revolution. When Napoleon's opportunity came, he, imitating Cromwell, enlaved the French nation through the army. Thus came to pass those ceaseless Napoleonic wars which devastated all Europe, and even threatened the destruction of civilisation itself.

ELIZABETHAN.—(Wednesday, May 6.)

FREDERICK ROGERS, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. William Hutchison read a paper on "Some French Criticisms of the Elizabethan Drama." It has been stated that the judgment of the foreigner is the judgment of posterity. This statement is, however, of dubious value, since it at once suggests an inquiry into what is understood by the terms foreigner and posterity. French criticism, like all other criticism, has been to a large extent mobile and relative. It would, however, be exaggeration to call all criticism relative, and conditioned by fluctuating standards of comparison. Much is to be said in favour of Matthew Arnold's comparative method, with its touchstones of style. Certain masters will remain secure and unchallenged in their position; and, among all masters in the expression of human emotion, there can be no possible doubt of the supreme master of all. But what was Shakspeare to the eighteenth century French critic? At best a sort of inspired drunken savage, who had written grotesque and monstrous farces, misnamed tragedies. A passage from Voltaire's Lettres sur les Anglais was quoted, in which Shakspeare is credited with genius, but is denied the possession of good taste or "the slightest knowledge of the rules." It was this want of Parisian bon goût, this "astonishing tranquillity" in walking through the rules, that condemned Shakspeare in the eyes of Voltaire. The latter's literary conservatism was an interesting feature in his somewhat conglomerate nature. Before dealing at length with Voltaire's critical treatment of Shakspeare, Mr. Hutchison gave a short account of pre-Voltairean criticism of the English drama, including that of Saint-Evremond, who resided for many years in England, and was the friend of Cowley and Waller. It was in 1726 that Voltaire came to England, where he remained for three years, using his magnificent capacity for assimilating and utilizing other men's ideas in the study of the language, history, literature, and philosophy of the country. Shakspeare, of course, engaged his attention and was awarded his qualified approval. To appreciate Shakspeare fully was not possible for him. He was essentially a product of his age and country, in which convention and artificiality reigned supreme. It was not then to be expected that he would prefer Shakspeare's boundless vision and all-embracing grasp of reality to the French dramatists, who kept so strictly within the bounds laid down by Aristotle and classical antiquity, that they made those bounds narrower still. However, Shakspeare had some influence on Voltaire, and partially inspired his tragedy of "Brutus," in the preface to which addressed to Bolingbroke, he has much to say regarding the restrictions hampering the French dramatist. While he would like to see a little more life infused into the French drama, he cannot help admiring the extreme delicacy of French audiences. He then draws a comparison between Lafosse's "Manlius Capitolinus," and Otway's "Venice Preserved," from which it was derived. He also alludes to Shakspeare's "Julius Caesar": although he cannot approve of its "barbarous irregularities," he is amazed "that there should not be more in a work written in an age of ignorance, by a man who did not even know Latin, and had only his own genius to guide him." He points out that a French audience of the period would not have tolerated the introduction on the stage of a throng of artisans and plebeians. This interesting preface concludes with a few words on the different treatment accorded to love and passion by French and English dramatists. Love on the French stage is apt to be no more than empty gallantry; on the English stage it occasionally degenerates into debauchery. In illustration, two passages are cited, one from "Alcibiade," the other from "Venice Preserved." Shakspeare's influence on Voltaire is also to be noticed in the latter's tragedies of "Eryphile" and "La Mort de César." The Lettres sur les Anglois created immense interest in France, and made English literature a fashionable study. The first translation of Shakspeare's works appeared in 1745, the translator being De la Place. Despite the poornees of the translation, the critical remarks show ample appreciation of Shakspeare expressed in vigorous terms. De la Place also translated plays by Otway, Ben Jonson, and Beaumont and Fletcher; and a glance through Delandine's Bibliographie Dramatique reveals a number of English plays which appeared about this time in a French dress. In addition, many dramas owed their inspiration to Shakspeare and the English school generally. Voltaire at first watched this "boom" in Shakspeare with considerable complacency; but he soon found it was going too far, and that there was a risk of French readers preferring "Hamlet" to "Zaire." In 1761 he published, under the pseudonym of Jerome Carré, a pamphlet attacking Shakspeare and the English dramatists. The critical value of this curious and amusing production, which mainly consists of synopses of "Hamlet" and Otway's "Orphan," may be gauged by the author's remark that the glory of the authorship of "Hamlet" must be ascribed to Saxo Grammaticus, whose romances were only put into dialogue by Shakspeare! Many allusions to Shakspeare are also to be found in Voltaire's correspondence and in the Dictionnaire Philosophique. His culminating attack was contained in the two letters which he addressed to the Academy in 1770, regarding Letourneur's translation. Mr. Hutchison then proceeded to compare at some length the French classical tragedy with the romanticism of the Elizabethan drama. While the former was a reproduction of an antique model, the latter was a development through moralities and interludes from the medieval miracle plays. The romantic drama, while it might be careless in detail, conveyed a fuller impression of actuality: it gave background, and in emotional power was infinitely superior to the French classical drama, with its conventions and over-elaborate rhetoric. The remainder of the paper was devoted to a detailed analysis and criticism of the treatment accorded to Ben Jonson by three modern critics, MM. Taine, Mézières, and Lafond. Of the three Taine is perhaps the most brilliant, but his erroneous conception of the English character and genius are apparent throughout his monumental work. Moreover, he holds his theory of "Race, Milieu, et Moment" too tightly, and his pyrotechnical criticism is more dazzling than luminous. M. Mézières, on the other hand, knows his subject well, treats it adequately with a fair knowledge of English life and character, and forbears from too ambitious flights of criticism. —In the discussion which followed, the chairman, Messrs. Payne, Hayward, Backwell, and Jenkinson, took part.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Tuesday May 12.)

E. W. BRABROOK, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. H. W. Seton-Karr exhibited and made remarks upon stone implements discovered by him in Somaliland.—Sir John Evans, Prof. Rupert Jones, and Mr. O. H. Read spoke on the value of the discovery.—A paper on "Recent Observations on the Andamanese," by Mr. M. V. Portman, was read by Dr. J. G.

Garson. A discussion followed, in which Sir W. H. Flower, Prof. Keane, Prof. Brigham, of Honolulu, and Mr. C. H. Read took part.—A second paper, on "Photographic Apparatus for Travellers," was read by Dr. J. G. Garson, who exhibited a number of cameras of various kinds.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

ONE often finds oneself regretting that Mr. Alma-Tadema, who remains, with all his exclusive devotion to Græco-Roman subjects and the everyday life of classical antiquity, a Netherlander in temperament, should not have adhered to subjects in closer and more real relation to his own times and his own race. He might thus have conquered for himself a reputation falling little short of that still enjoyed by his great predecessors of the seventeenth century. For instance, in a pure piece of genre giving legitimate scope for the treatment of sumptuous accessories, like that "Interior of the Artist's Studio," in the collections of the late Lord Leighton, Mr. Tadema is incomparable. In "The Coliseum" (291) we can but deplore the tastelessness which goes hand in hand with, and neutralises, exquisite technical skill. No one but the Anglo-Dutch artist could have painted the white-robed Roman damsels in the foreground; and, on the other hand, few artists of the same high rank would have ventured to put before the public such an imperfectly digested mass of fine pictorial material as the work contains. "Whispering Noon" may count among the better, though not the very best, of his delicate little genre pieces of the idyllic type.

Mr. Poynter appears to have lost that ambition, that strenuous aspiration to attain perfection through patient effort, which gave interest to his "Israel in Egypt," his "Atalanta," and his "Homage of the Graces to Asclepius." Such pieces of laboured prettiness as "An Oread" and "Neobulé (Hor. Od. iii. 12)" call for no extended criticism, though in them the artist has done his best according to his peculiar views.

For a cold pseudo-classicism, which to-day convinces neither the painter nor his public, Mr. J. W. Waterhouse substitutes a romanticism with which his own artistic temperament, as well as that of his race, is thoroughly in accord; and though his subject, "Pandora," is one prima facie marked out for classical treatment, he in the romantic mode achieves a great success. He has been able to sum himself up here—to show a unity and concentration of style, for which it would not be easy to find a parallel in any of his previous works. His timid, exquisite little nymph—she is hardly a goddess—who, in the august solitude of the forest, peeps fearfully into the mysterious casket fashioned of gold and barbaric jewels, may not be the ideal Pandora, yet she casts a spell over us which it is hard to resist.

It would be churlish not to give Mr. Solomon J. Solomon his due meed of praise for so courageously venturing upon a subject like "The Birth of Love," upon which even now the Royal Academy public looks with a feeling akin to distaste. His great upright composition, showing Venus wafted in roseate nudity over a fair sea, with a circle of Loves fluttering round her head, recalls Cabanel, and still more Paul Baudry. In its mannered elegance and meretricious charm, it is French rather than English. A certain emptiness of handling throughout is very characteristic of this painter: it is to be found also in his otherwise agreeable portrait, "Mrs. Albert H. Jessel."

A beautiful harmony of pallid flesh, blue skies flecked with white, and foaming wave is Mr. J. M. Swan's "The Sirens"; and it is something more than this. He has got the artist's vigour of the scene, as well as its lovely colour. If the arrangement of the chief figure, with its somewhat too opulent contours, is fairly open to criticism, nothing could be more delightful than the fair forms of her sister sirens, half revealed through the veil of foam which rises from the dancing waves. Mr. Swan is much less successful in his two other canvases, "Study of East African Leopards" and "The Lion-hunter."

Great skill of quite another kind in drawing and modelling the nude is evidenced by Mr. J. W. Godward in "Campaspe," an académie, as our neighbours would call it, of unimpeachable design, though not of any great significance. The beloved of Alexander, depicted here in entire nudity, as she was, according to tradition, depicted by Apelles, is a painted statue in the flat, rather than a being of real flesh and blood with true atmospheric environment. This canvas is thus absolutely opposed in treatment to a capital piece of technique in the prevailing foreign mode, "The Nymph of the Bay," by Mr. Arthur P. Burton. Delicately grey and rose, in a grey twilight landscape, is the flesh of the well-fashioned studio model who does duty here as the nymph of the region. She has the beauty and elasticity of life; and the great sweep of bay, too, which unrolls itself at her feet, is finely rendered. Yet the whole, for want of some special significance in the conception, remains not much more than an excellent school exercise. Mrs. Raphael, in her "Wood Nymph," shows less skill, but a higher ambition, with a certain power to spiritualise the nude human form of which the last-mentioned artist gives no proof. Her pale virginal figure with the classic head-gear is awkwardly composed with the tree-trunks amid which it stands, but it has some of that charm which we associate with Prud'hon and with Ingres. The nude female figure "Summer," lying amid heaped-up crimson and yellow roses, which has been sent by Miss Henrietta Rae, proves above all things that the artist has studied not wisely but too well Cabanel's "Venus," now or lately in the gallery of the Luxembourg. All this is, however, very promising, as giving proof of a serious study of the nude by our younger artists. If we are ever to have in England a decorative art of the higher order, such a preparation for it is indispensable. But why take so restricted a view of this main branch of artistic study, and confine it to the representation of the female figure in one or two hackneyed poses? It is not alone the colourist who finds his opportunities in the perfections of the human form, but, above all, the painter in love with rhythm and harmony not less of conception than of design. From this point of view the male form may well be deemed to show beauties of a higher order, and generally a deeper significance. The Greeks in the golden time of their maturity, and Michaelangelo at the climax of the Renaissance, sufficiently demonstrated this in their greatest masterpieces.

In his three productions Mr. Frank Dicksee has applied himself to three distinct branches of his art, and in no instance, it must be owned, without a large measure of success. "The Mirror" shows a woman of faultless feature and form, seated on a magnificent throne of silver and mother-of-pearl, as she gazes into a silver hand-glass. This is avowedly not more than an excuse for the display of fine draughtsmanship and carefully thought-out colour—an exercise in the well-balanced juxtaposition of splendid tints and objects. Once more the infinitely painstaking artist makes us feel the difference between the colourist by calculation and the colourist by nature. The self-set task in his elaborate piece of genre on a large scale, "The Confession," has been a double one. He has indulged in the tour de force of a white picture, and has at the same time realised with a certain melodramatic force the scene in which a consumptive woman on the point of death makes to her husband a confession which, if we are to judge by her significant exhibition of the nuptial ring, is one of infidelity. A novelty in his practice is the delicate little sea-piece, "On the Brittany Coast."

M. Bouguereau's contribution to the Royal Academy need not arrest us, so ordinary an example is it of an art in its peculiar way accomplished, yet rarely other than uninteresting. M. Benjamin Constant comes forward not this time as the painter of the East, with its sunlight, glitter, and its dramatic romance, but in the doubtless more lucrative rôle of portrait-painter. There is the semblance, rather than the reality, of fine colour in his portrait, "Madame L. G.," presenting a lady whose mature charms have an Oriental luxuriance. The colour is downright ugly in the strongly modelled half-length "H.E. the Right Hon. Sir Julian Pauncefote, G.C.B.," a discord of chocolate in the background, gold in the embroideries, crimson in the ribbon of the Bath, and dark blue in the uniform. Moreover, the true character of a downright British and yet an engaging personality has not been caught. M. Constant makes amends in the excellent and audaciously frank portrait of that journalistic celebrity, M. de Blowitz. It is a likeness that will, with its vein of genuine humour, delight the public, but may possibly in a less degree enchant the sifter.

Mr. J. J. Shannon is in his most serious vein in his single contribution to the main exhibition of the year, the half-length portrait, "Mrs. Baird." Careful objective characterisation, without much sympathy, strong draughtsmanship and modelling mark this work, which ranks far above his usual fashionable presentations of fair women, and with the best of his male portraits.

It is as a portrait painter that Mr. Stanhope Forbes achieves his greatest distinction this time, although in this branch he manages to be much more unpleasant in colour and handling than he need be, even in dealing with rugged types of manhood all too scornful of the Graces. In the three portraits exhibited, much the same bottle-green background is preserved, and there are further disagreeable reminders in the half-tones of the flesh of this ugly tint. Especially in the three-quarter length, "Sir Peter Eade, M.D., Mayor of Norwich," does a genuine sympathy between the painter and his subject reveal itself, though it induces the former rather to accentuate than to tone down physical imperfections resulting from the decay proper to advancing years. Mr. Stanhope Forbes's most important canvas, "The New Calf" is marked by his usual qualities and his usual defects. We are by this time more than a little weary of the conflicting illumination—fire and lantern within, and light of dawn or twilight without—which this artist, Mr. Frank Bramley, and many others following them, have so much affected. The group of peasants looking on as the cow gives suck to her new calf is observed both truthfully and tenderly, and each figure taken by itself is good. What is less so is the heaviness of the whole, the too obvious deliberation of the working out, the failure to suggest true movement and the buoyancy of life. In these respects Mr. Frank Bramley shows himself, in his similar work, "While there is Life there is Hope," greatly superior to his brother artist. His palette has retained, too, in this in-door scene some of the sparkle and variety which he has acquired in treating open-air subjects. His composition is better balanced as well as more spontaneous than that of his rival, his observations of rustic life not less tender or less true.

The important canvas, "The Cloister and the World," of Mr. Arthur Hacker has the technical accomplishment, in the most modern mode, of a French or Franco-American painter of to-day, and with it much of that shallowness, that false idealism, serving to distinguish a certain new development of French art, before which realism has momentarily retreated. The nun, kneeling on the sunlit sward between the white-winged, white-robed, guardian angel on the one hand and the rainbow-hued Love and Pleasure on the other, prays ardently no doubt, yet with too manifest a consciousness of her audience. Noteworthy is the brilliancy of the whole, with little positive colour, and the unity of tone in a high, bright key: especially clever being the way in which the nun's robe, under the strong radiance emanating from the angel, is made to appear golden without ceasing to be black. The great danger to the picture in its decorative aspect is thus skilfully avoided.

Mr. La Thangue is one of our most earnest students of light, both natural and artificial. His pictures are, in the main, studies devoted to the elaborate working out of some particular problem of illumination. To the adequate exposition of what the artist has in view, he deliberately sacrifices much of pictorial grace and charm. In "The Man with the Scythe," the first notion of which may have been derived from M. Maeterlinck's "L'Intruse," there is, however, worked out with a reticence that does not exclude tenderness, a human motive, as well as a study of atmospheric effect. Outside a cottage door a sick child pillowed on a rustic armchair has fallen into a sleep of exhaustion, and her mother bends down anxiously to gaze at her, just as an old labourer, shouldering his scythe, passes by the gate. The atmospheric moment is that peculiar one of hushed silence and seeming airlessness when the sun has vanished, and twilight, soon to pass into evening, has appeared. Here, as in the two other canvases presently to be mentioned, Mr. La Thangue quite arbitrarily takes his horizon line much higher than it would naturally be. "In a Cottage Garden" is brilliantly clever, in so far as it depicts without trick, and yet with singular felicity, the effect of the dying sunlight gilding with red-gold the face and form of an old woman, who is occupied in sawing wood in her garden. The lines of the composition are, it appears to us, unnecessarily ugly: they are broken up into a succession of acute angles of decidedly unpictorial effect. The third canvas is entitled "A Small Holding." It is a study of sunlight flickering through foliage on to the ground, and covering with bright patches alternating with shadow the feathered inhabitants of the farmyard, as thickly massed, all white and yellow against an earthy soil, they gather at the feet of a woman who bends to feed them. It is in this clever, unconventional performance that the peculiar mannerism of the artist's brush-work is most apparent.

CLAUDE PHILLIPS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE National Portrait Gallery will be open on Sunday for the first time to-morrow.

ADMITTERS of the late Ford Madox Brown will be glad to hear that a small collection of his designs and cartoons will form a feature of the forthcoming exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society, to be held at the New Gallery in the autumn. The deceased artist, who was a member of the Arts and Crafts Society from its foundation, contributed an essay on "Mural Painting" to the catalogue of their exhibition of 1889.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: a select collection of pictures by French masters of the present century—including "La Mare aux Vipères," by Diaz—at the gallery of Messrs. Obach & Co., Cockspur-street; and a small collection of oil-paintings by various artists—English, French, and Dutch—at Mr. E. J. van Wisselingh's Dutch Gallery, Brook-street.

DR. ROBERT MUNRO, secretary of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, will, on Thursday next, deliver the first of two lectures at the Royal Institution, on "Lake Dwellings."

THE late George Richmond, R.A., has bequeathed to the National Portrait Gallery two drawings by himself of John Keble and Samuel Rogers; £100 to the Artists' General Benevolent Institution; and to his son, the Rev. T. K. Richmond, the silver plate given to him for his services in the purchase of Sir Robert Peel's pictures for the nation.

THE frontispiece to the June part of the Magazine of Art will be a photogravure of a painting by the Hungarian artist, Jendrassik Jenő; and the additional plate will be a wood-engraving of Troyon's "Cattle," recently presented to the Glasgow Gallery.

THE following have been elected members of the Royal Society of British Artists—Messrs. T. W. Cafe, Isaac Cooke, A. H. Collings, O. Eokhardt, John Eyre, Reginald Frampton, G. P. Gaskell, W. Lee Hankey, Charles Low, J. W. T. Manuel, and S. H. Sims.

THE following is the result of the annual competition at the Crystal Palace exhibition of pictures by British and foreign artists, the judges this year being Mr. W. P. Frith, Mr. G. A. Storey, and Mr. E. M. Wimperis. In the competition among English artists for historical or figure subjects in oil, the gold medal fell to Mr. J. R. Reid, for "The Mate of the Mermaid's Wedding." Silver medals in this class were awarded to Mr. J. H. Bacon, Mr. F. W. Topham, Mr. Haynes King, and Mr. J. L. Gloag. Mr. Frank Walton's "Mists in May and Heat in June" received the gold medal for landscapes, sea-pieces, animals, and other subjects; and other prizes in this class were awarded to Mr. A. Helcke, Mr. G. C. Haité, Mr. E. Hayes, Mr. A. E. Proctor, Mr. W. Strutt, Mr. T. G. Cooper, and Mr. J. Peel. A seapiece, "The Morning of Another Day," by Mr. J. Nash, won the gold medal for water-colours.

THE library of the late Prof. Overbeck, the eminent archaeologist, has been purchased by Mr. Karl W. Hiersemann, of Leipzig, who will shortly send out special catalogues.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Héron de Villefosse exhibited some magnificent examples of Greek art, which have been acquired by the Louvre. In particular, there was a golden tiara, hammered out and chased, in an admirable state of preservation. Its weight is 443 grammes; its height, 20 centimeters; its diameter, across the base, 18 centimeters. It was found in a tomb, near the ancient town of Olbia, in the Crimea. The most interesting thing about it is that it bears the following inscription:

Η ΒΟΥΑΗ ΚΑΙ Ο ΑΗΜΟΣ Ο ΟΑΒΙΟΠΟΛΕΙΤΑΝ ΒΑCΙΑΕΑ ΜΕΓΑΝ ΚΑΙ ΑΝΕΙΚΗΤΟΝ ΚΑΙΤΑΦΑΡΗΝΗ. It is known, from an inscription that has long been familiar, that Saitapharnes was a barbarian king, who frequently made incursions into the territory of Olbia, and levied tribute from the inhabitants. On one occasion, when the king appeared on the bank of the Hypanis, a rich citizen of Olbia, Protogenes by name, offered him 900 pieces of gold. The king rejected this offer as insufficient, and declared war against the city; but he was finally bought off with magnificent presents. Is it possible to believe that this tiara was among them?

THE STAGE.

At last there has been produced at a London theatre a piece that is absolutely healthy and yet not dull. "Rosemary: that's for Remembrance," by Messrs. Louis Parker and Murray Carson, was brought out at the Criterion a few nights since. It is not a faultless piece. It is not altogether well constructed. It is written in more keys than one, and the change of key is sometimes sudden and, as one might say, arbitrary. But the piece has youth of spirit in it. It has naïveté; it has fancy. It discusses no burning problem for the satisfaction of those who think a playhouse ought to be a forum. And it is acted well all round, but more particularly well by Mr. Charles Wyndham, who is a youthful middle-aged man in one act and a veteran—lagging not altogether superfluous—in another. Yes, it is a charming piece, as theatrical pieces go. It is simple while it is ingenious; and it has feeling while also it has comedy. Mr. Wyndham and his authors are to be congratulated upon an eminently creditable, if unconventional, performance. And as a theatrical audience even now does not consist entirely of the pessimists and the blasés, we take it "Rosemary" will have a frank success.

THE two Miss Beringers have appeared as Romeo and Juliet. The experiment was interesting; the result, upon the whole, satisfactory. Miss Vera Beringer played Juliet. She is too young, perhaps, to exhibit passion. This and great impulse, too, were no doubt lacking. Nor is she yet—and she could not possibly be at present—a consummate actress, such as we wish for in the part. But the ideal Juliet we may, perhaps, never see: it is the one part of which it is said most truly that no one can act it until she is no longer young enough to look it. Youth, at all events, is Miss Vera Beringer's, and a distinct and trained intelligence. The girl who, in her childhood, was so entirely charming in the "Little Lord Fauntleroy," has a right to be again seen, and can scarcely fail to again interest. We do not generally like young men's parts played by girls, for there are plenty of charming girls' parts for charming girls to play. One charming girl, however—and that is Miss Esmé Beringer—has just now shown she can be an admirable Romeo, poetic and magnetic, sensitive, graceful, and not wanting in power. A creation remarkable and half instructive, having in it some delightful art, but much delightful nature, we ought surely to have the opportunity of seeing again, and that before long. Miss Esmé Beringer is a thousand times better employed in such a work than in the kind of piece she has been seen in most recently at the Comedy.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS, ETC.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Elijah" was performed last Thursday week, at the Queen's Hall, under the direction of Mr. Randegger. This is the jubilee year of the oratorio, which still enjoys undiminished popularity. Mr. F. G. Edwards, in his recently published History of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah," shows how carefully the composer planned his work, how earnestly he laboured at it, and how well he understood the importance of attending to minute details. The correspondence between the Rev. J. Schubring and Mendelssohn with regard to the text reveals a striking fact. The composer was "most anxious to do full justice to the dramatic element"; but Schubring desired "to keep down the dramatic, and raise the sacred element." Had Mendelssohn followed his own instincts, and had he not been influenced by a well-meaning, though mistaken, clergyman, the oratorio might possibly have proved less popular, or rather not have achieved popularity so rapidly as was the case, but it would have been more in keeping with the art-views now prevalent. Without wishing in any way to depreciate the value of the work, the fact that it has been threatened by no formidable rival must not be forgotten. "Elijah" is really the only oratorio of modern times which has enjoyed something more than temporary success. The performance last week was, on the whole, good. Of the four principal vocalists—Miss Macintyre, Mme. Belle Cole, and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley—the two gentlemen have been specially associated with the work for many years past.

At the Royal Institution on Saturday afternoon Mr. F. Corder gave the second of a series of three lectures on Berlioz, Wagner, and Liszt—three composers all more or less of the same school; all more or less friendly the one with the other; and all remarkable for the fierce attacks made on them by critics. After a concise sketch of Wagner's life, and some interesting comments on the wonderful evolution from "Rienzi" to the "Nibelungen" and "Parsifal," the lecturer touched upon what he termed a "painful" subject—viz., the persistent hostility displayed by the critics towards Wagner, and the abuse which many of them showered upon the man. The persistent hostility seems to us, however, easy of explanation. Wagner moved onward and upward at such a rapid rate that novelty, which Mr. Corder thinks may account for the hostility shown at the outset, was ever presenting itself anew. Interesting was the allusion to Dr. Prout, who, after hearing the first performance of "Parsifal," retracted certain opinions formed from reading the score. The Dublin Professor was held up as a model critic, and his honesty certainly deserves full recognition. But it was scarcely logical to compare his conduct with that of the stubborn critics mentioned above: the cases were not parallel. After frequent hearings they remained unconverted; Dr. Prout merely withdrew opinions formed from reading a colourless pianoforte score. Mr. Corder's lecture was listened to with marked attention.

The Prelude and an Entr'acte from Goldmark's opera "The Cricket on the Hearth," recently produced at Vienna, were performed at the first Richter Concert on Monday evening. In both numbers the thematic material, some of it of folk character, is taken from the opera. Wagner in his Preludes has adopted a similar method; but there is organic life in them, and masterly developments render them interesting even as absolute music. Goldmark only presents us with fresh melodies, showy writing, and striking colouring. If the opera comes and conquers, then association will play its part: at present, the music in a concert room can only create passing interest. Dr. Richter gave a fine performance of Tchaikowsky's Symphony in E minor (No. 5), a fine work, but not so great, nor of such equal merit throughout, as the later and last one in B minor. The renderings of the "Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" Preludes were admirable. The conductor never displayed greater ease or greater mastery.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave his third pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon. His programme included show pieces by Rubinstein and Liszt; but there is no necessity for us to expatiate on the wonderful technical gifts of the pianist. Hitherto we have not been able to make up our mind as to his power of interpreting the great masters, of revealing the soul as well as the body—for the notes are little more—of the music. On Tuesday he played three works which, as test pieces, could not be improved upon. In Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111) the Promethean resistance and the Promethean resignation were not fully realised; in Weber's Sonata in A flat—the greatest of the four—there were striking contrasts, powerful effects, but the reading lacked tenderness, romance; in Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor, the playing was exaggerated both in the bold and delicate sections, and the poetry of the music suffered accordingly. In judging such a man as Mr. D'Albert we adopt, naturally, a high standard: that is, Rubinstein. The technical powers of that pianist were enormous; but with the exception of an occasional revolt, those powers, like his intellectual gifts, were held under proper control: the music came from his heart and went straight to that of his audience. Mr. D'Albert seems to us a great artist who, by pandering to the gods, has lowered himself to the rank of a first-class pianist: there are many moments in his playing which show what he might have been.

Two other pianists deserve a word of mention. Mlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, a French pianist of good taste and sound judgment, gave a recital on Friday week, and her interpretations of pieces by Bach, Schumann, and Weber were highly satisfactory. Her technique is neat, her phrasing intelligent, and her playing expressive and unaffected. The hall was far from full. At this season of the year, however, concerts are numerous, to say nothing of other attractions; and many capable artists find it difficult to attract a large audience.

M. Emil Sauer gave his second recital on Saturday afternoon, and Mr. Corder's lecture closed in time for us to hear him play Schumann's "Carnaval." The reading of the work showed thought, character, and feeling. It was not quite after the style of Mme. Schumann, but on that very account deserves praise. Mme. Schumann, no doubt, was—her death at an advanced age is announced at the moment of our writing—the best representative of the composer's conception of the music; pianists, however, must interpret according to their feelings—that is, within certain limits, they must display their individuality.

The Bach Choir gave their third concert on Tuesday at the Queen's Hall. The programme opened with Astorg's "Stabat Mater," a noble work of the early part of the eighteenth century. The greatness and pathos of the music are strongly felt, but a concert-room is not the proper place for it: in a cathedral, and given quite according to the intentions of the composer, it would produce far greater effect. Miss Fanny Davies rendered with immense spirit Bach's fine Concerto in D minor: the opening of the third movement must surely have been running in Mendelssohn's head when he wrote his "Rondo Capriccioso." The programme concluded with Dr. Parry's setting of the choric song at the end of Tennyson's poem "The Lotus-Eaters": the introductory lines were effectively declaimed by Mr. Forbes Robinson. Dr. Parry's music is thoroughly suitable to the words: it is full of clever and expressive details; and there is no over-elaboration, no straining after effect. Yet the poetry seems to us already to have sufficient music in it: what Dr. Parry furnishes, though always appropriate in character, often seems superfluous. Again, the soft, sensuous, tones pall a little on the ear: what can be said cannot always be sung. Dr. Stanford conducted the "Stabat Mater" and the "Concerto," and Dr. Parry his own work, which, by the way, was first produced at Cambridge in 1892.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

THE LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.—"It is essential that Dissenters and Methodist Churchmen should know why they stand apart from the National Establishment, and this knowledge can only come through the study of the ecclesiastical history of the last 300 years. . . . We ought to be specially grateful to Mr. Skeats and Mr. Miall for the light which they have shed upon the experiences of the Nonconformists of England."

THE POWER of the DOG. An

Entirely New Novel. By ROWLAND GREY. Author of "In Sunny Switzerland," "By Virtue of his Office," "Linden-Blumen," "Chris." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"One has to read the greater part of this story before one learns that Mr. Grey's title is not metaphorical, and that a real live dog plays the most important part in bringing about the tragic and terrible dénouement. Even if there were neither dog nor dénouement the book would be well worth reading. In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly original."—Daily Chronicle.

"The subject which the author has undertaken to handle is a delicate one, but it is treated with a refinement of feeling and a tenderness of sympathy which leave no doubt as to the wholesomeness of the purpose for which the story has been written. Much as the attention is absorbed by the central characters, there are others in the volume whose gifts and graces are pictured with equal reality, cleverness, and vigour."—Scotsman.

NOW READY, FIRST VOLUME in
BY A NEW AUTHOR, entitled

By GEORGE KNIGHT.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

With Title-page and cover design by Laurence Housman. "Success in art of this kind is not given to everyone. Mr. Knight's skill here shows that he will not go without his reward. He has the gift of bringing together the prose and the poetry of life."

"All the stories are remarkable in technique, the delicate shadowing of character rather than the exact delineation of the orthodox novel, the remarkably wide range of local colour, the astonishing variety of the subjects and the characters, all these are marks of the true artist, and all these are plainly evident in Mr. Knight's book."—Liverpool Porcupine.

"Well written and will repay perusal."—Glasgow Herald. "Characterized by originality of conception and delicacy of treatment. The volume presents us with an array of impressionist pictures graphically drawn and full of suggestiveness and revealing insight into the deep and tenderest things of life. The book will be read with pleasure by all who enjoy fresh and imaginative work."—Eastern Daily Press.

LITERATURE.

THE LIVES OF TWO NATURALISTS.

Life, Letters, and Works of Louis Agassiz.
By Jules Marcou. In 2 vols. (Macmillans.)

Written and edited by his Wife. (Longmans.)

LOUIS AGASSIZ, the celebrated Swiss naturalist, died in 1873. His Life has already been written in two volumes by his wife, a gifted and devoted American lady, to whom Agassiz owed the comparative peace and prosperity in which his days were ended. I have never seen this book; but Mr. Marcou tells us, and I can well believe him, that as a biography it is not satisfactory, being more of a eulogy than a faithful picture of one who had very serious faults, and who was all the more interesting because of his faults. The work had all to be done over again, and Mr. Marcou was well qualified to do it, having enjoyed the friendship and confidence of Agassiz during nearly thirty years, besides being associated with his scientific labours. The new Life goes too much into petty detail, and sometimes shows traces of strong prejudice, particularly where English things are concerned; but it certainly succeeds in conveying a very vivid impression of a very remarkable personality.

As a naturalist, Agassiz belonged to the school of Cuvier and Humboldt, Sedgwick and Owen. He was great in observation, description, classification; a hero of lecture rooms, museums, and exploring expeditions; not a thinker or, except in his youth, a theorist, and therefore very prone to fall back on traditional or theological views. His hostility to Darwinism is well known, and has been very uncharitably attributed to time-serving religious hypocrisy. But his position at Harvard was quite secure when the new views about the origin of species appeared, and those views were accepted without apparently any loss of popularity by many of the younger American naturalists. There can be no doubt that he sincerely believed in the doctrine of fixed types, inherited from Cuvier, and naturally much more congenial to the French intellect—Agassiz was thoroughly French—than the doctrine of evolution. Mr. Marcou, himself a strong anti-transformist, seems to think that temperament has a good deal to do with the bent of belief in this respect.

"Naturalists," he says, "may be divided into two categories: those who are philosophical naturalists, and those who are, above all, guided by well-observed facts. Philosophers are all dreamers and isolate themselves as much as they can not only from society, but even from companionship with their fellow-workers" (vol. ii., p. 112).

And he proceeds to give several instances of such self-isolation, including, among others, Darwin and Wallace. The second class of naturalists are "anything but hermits"; they are always observing and comparing notes; they do not dream, or only just a little occasionally; they do not theorise beyond the warrant of facts; "all true and solid progress is due to" them; they alone furnish the facts about which the philosophers theorise. What induced the social naturalists to collect facts, or how the world ever came to understand such notions as "fact" and "theory" without the help of the solitary dreaming philosophers—these are questions that do not seem to interest Mr. Marcou: indeed, to ask them he should be a philosopher, which he is not. Nay, so careless is he of the most ordinary self-consistency as to mention Cuvier at the very head of his social naturalists, although he himself tells us not long afterwards (ii., p. 232) that Cuvier, unlike Agassiz, "took care to screen himself, and preferred the solitude of his laboratory and library." He also praises Cuvier for his honesty, and for having "too high an idea of his priesthood in natural history not to protest against the acceptance of theories not fully sustained by facts patiently accumulated" (ii., p. 112). Yet, on a subsequent occasion, he very frankly informs us that Cuvier "failed completely in trying to maintain the question [sic] of the universal deluge, and the biblical genesis, notwithstanding many contradictory facts well known to him, and which [sic] he systematically ignored; as witness his celebrated command to his assistant Laurillard, to throw out of the laboratory window the skeleton of the fossil man of Laehr, found in the loess by Ami Boué, saying: 'Cela vient d'un cimetière'" (ii., p. 229).

Perhaps it is because they are only the laymen of natural history that evolutionists do not burke adverse evidence in this fashion.

One would like to know in which of his two classes Mr. Marcou places Jean de Charpentier, the true author of the glacial theory. He certainly seems to appreciate at his true value that great discoverer—a much greater man, as it seems to me, than Agassiz—and he has put together a number of facts about him and his services to science that deserve to be more widely known. For rarely, indeed, has any savant been treated with such unjust neglect by his contemporaries and by posterity as this modest geologist. The name of Jean de Charpentier does not occur in Chambers' Cyclopædia, nor in the Grande Encyclopédie, nor in the Biographie Générale. Although he was a German, the last edition of the Conversations-Lexicon only gives him nine lines, in which the glacial theory is not mentioned. This is really a European scandal, and I am glad that Mr. Marcou's book gives me an opportunity for calling attention to it. The facts, as it relates them, are these.

A mountaineer named Perraudin "told Charpentier, so far back as 1815, that the large boulders perched on the sides of the Alpine valleys were carried and left there by glaciers." At the time Charpentier refused to believe it, but was convinced by the arguments of his friend, the civil engineer Venetz, fourteen years later. Having the scientific training which Venetz wanted, he was able to place the theory on a solid basis, by collecting and classifying "all the material proofs, such as the moraines, the roches moutonnées polies et striées, the cailloux striés, the bous glaciaires," &c., so that, in Mr. Marcou's words, "to Charpentier is due the glacial doctrine and the glacial theory" (vol. i., pp. 74, 75). During a visit to Charpentier at his house near Bex, Agassiz was in his turn converted to the new theory, and soon generalised it into the doctrine of a glacial period or "ice-age," during which cold was supposed to have "prevailed all over the world" (p. 85). But to say nothing of the share claimed by his friend Schimper—who is acknowledged to have first used the word "Eiszeit"—the theory as propounded by Agassiz involved so much falsity that only a moderate amount of credit can be given him for it. His theory, as enunciated in an address delivered at Neuchâtel in 1837, consisted of the following suppositions: that the earth in the course of its history has been subject to periodically recurring fits of cold intense enough to cover the whole globe with a thick cap of ice; that this cold led to the total destruction of the living species at that time existing, and prepared the way for a fresh creation; that at the close of the last ice-age the chain of the Alps was thrown up by a violent catastrophe resulting in the disruption of the ice-cap, and the formation of what may be called false glaciers, down which masses of rock rolled to the places they still occupy. "It is not surprising," observes Mr. Marcou, "that Charpentier shook his head, and was sorry to see his glacial theory used as a vehicle for such biological dreams and fantastic explanations of the 'rôle' played by the upheaval of the Alps" (vol. i., p. 110). It is quite clear that Agassiz caught at the idea of an ice-age as a convenient explanation of those entirely fictitious clearances of life from the earth which he blindly accepted from his master Cuvier. It is, then, rather strange that Mr. Marcou should speak of the question of an ice-age as having been afterwards "settled according to the views of Agassiz"; although not at all surprising that the latter, with characteristic boastfulness, should exalt his own share in the discovery at the expense of Charpentier, whose part, he wrote in 1868, "se réduit à avoir démontré la grande extension du glacier du Rhône" (p. 211). This is a case in which, as Pindar says, the first finder has done all. When it was once admitted that erratic blocks could be transported from the Alps to the summit of the Jura by a glacier, and when all the evidences of glacial action had been scientifically co-ordinated, the extension of the theory followed of itself.

The hasty and discourteous manner in which Agassiz pushed on the publication of his own views, without waiting for the appearance of Charpentier's essay on the same subject, led to a breach between the two—one among the series of quarrels that characterised the relations of this very social naturalist with nearly every man of science whom he co-operated with. Sometimes the fault was theirs and sometimes his; but, be the cause what it may, he managed to be always in hot water. He habitually left his numerous assistants unpaid, and he seems to have appropriated their labours without due acknowledgment. One of them, Desor, the evil genius of his life, retaliated in kind by plundering Agassiz both of his money and of his discoveries (vol. i., p. 299). This terrible secretary followed him to America, and was at last only got rid of through the intervention of Mr. Marcou, to whom the great naturalist confided his grievances, "crying and sobbing like a child" (vol. ii., p. 9).

Amid all these petty and virulent squabbles, it is satisfactory to find a full and frank acknowledgment of the service done to the glacial theory by our own Tyndall. "It was reserved for him, the great pupil and successor of Faraday," after the failure of all previous attempts,

"to explain fully the origin of glaciers, the pressure theory, regelation, crystallisation and internal liquefaction, the veined structure; in fact, all the internal mechanism of glaciers. The principles set forth in Tyndall's Glaciers of the Alps come next to the great discoveries of Venetz and De Charpentier, and to Agassiz's Ice-age (vol. i., p. 205)— with, one may add, the great advantage over the latter of being entirely true.

The life of Romanes, prosperous, respectable, unruffled, and happy in everything except its brief duration, presents a marked contrast to the turbulent career of Agassiz. But perhaps for that very reason it is devoid of interest. Letters about the nervous system of the Medusae, Pangenesis, and Weismannism, interlarded with other letters containing descriptions of domestic felicity, lists of distinguished names, and compliments paid by their owners to Romanes, do not make up a very appetising or nutritious literary sandwich. Probably nothing that Romanes published during his lifetime has attracted such attention as the little posthumous volume called Thoughts on Religion; and the present Life will be valued by many only for the few supplementary notices throwing light on the history of his religious opinions. A very religious education, combined with the impression made by the death of a very dear friend, and with continuous home influences, prepared a very sensitive surface on which the atmosphere of Oxford—such an Oxford as Mr. Hardy has recently laid open to us—acted freely during the last years of this amiable naturalist's life. Yet it does not appear that Romanes would ever have sacrificed Darwinism to Anglican Christianity had he believed the two to be incompatible. To one who fancies that they are compatible any belief is possible, and his final creed must be a matter of accident. Some light is thrown on the mental constitution of this not very authoritative convert by the incidental notice that "Mr. Lecky's works were among the very few historical books which he read with any real pleasure" (p. 285). One would have thought that a taste for Mr. Lecky's works was impossible without a taste for history in general; but the important thing is the revelation of historical incompetence on the part of one whose last years were largely occupied with the solution of that great historical problem, the origin of Christianity.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Shakspeare and his Predecessors. By Frederick S. Boas. (John Murray.)

It demands some boldness in the present day to add to "the ever-increasing mass of Shaksperian literature"; and it requires no little ability, and at least an equal endowment of common sense, to justify the boldness. The best praise that can be given to Mr. Boas is that, in spite of the flaws and errors of judgment inevitable in such a work as his, he has justified his own choice. He attempts, in the first place, to find a vacant place, as it were, for his book, and pleads that there is "no English work dealing in some detail with all the dramatist's writings in their approximate chronological order." This is true, but not in the sense which alone would make it important. For, firstly, Mr. Boas's own method is only approximately chronological. Thus, the Sonnets are discussed before the earliest of the dramas, and the three Roman plays are grouped after the great tragedies, though, of course, "Julius Cæsar" precedes them. And, secondly, the chronological method has been applied to Shakspeare over and over again, and pretty nearly all that it can yield, at least for our time, has been extracted. It would have been marvellous had the fact been otherwise; for Shakspeare is not only the greatest name in English literature, he is also the greatest example of development. Tennyson perhaps comes next in respect of the interest to be derived from the chronological method; and even Tennyson is next only after a long interval. Thus, Mr. Boas's book stands alone in English, not as dealing with Shakspeare on any new plan, but only, in the strictest sense of his own words, as dealing in some detail with all Shakspeare's works in their approximate chronological order. The merit of Mr. Boas lies not in freshness of design, but rather in the able marshalling of evidence, in the gift of clear analysis, and in sanity of judgment.

All critics handling well-worn themes are tempted to paradox in pursuit of a spurious originality. Mr. Boas never falls into this mistake, and rarely into the cognate error of pressing too far minute or doubtful points. Sometimes, but not frequently, he shows an undue respect for merely conventional judgments. It is rather to his credit that little of what he tells us is absolutely new; for if it were, the probability is that it would not be true. "No man," he says of Shakspeare himself, "was ever less at pains to be original in the ordinary sense." Mr. Boas, too, has been at no pains to be original. With clear good sense, he has perceived that his best service will be rendered by an intelligent handling of the old materials of criticism, but still more of the plays themselves. Using above all the works of Shakspeare to interpret Shakspeare, Mr. Boas has produced what is within its own limits one of the best guides to the meaning of the great dramatist. His book may be read always with interest, generally with agreement, and not without profit even where the reader may differ from him. For the young student especially his guidance will be valuable. There are many intelligent readers who at first find it difficult to grasp the meaning of a Shaksperian play as a whole. For them Mr. Boas's method is excellent. Each drama in turn is subjected to analysis; and the admirable grouping of the principal points of itself goes far towards clearing away difficulties.

Nor is this by any means the only, though perhaps it is the greatest, merit of Mr. Boas's book. It gives evidence everywhere of thought and culture. Though he never wanders from his subject, and seems, indeed, to exercise a severe self-restraint, the author occasionally suggests interesting comparisons. Such, for example, is the comparison of Henry V. before Agincourt with Barbour's Bruce. Occasionally, again, he sheds light by bringing into connexion parts of Shakspeare's own works at first sight widely separated. His comparison of the characters of Cleopatra and Falstaff is really illuminative. And, again, his remarks on the influence of local conditions upon Shakspeare are worthy of attention:

"It is," he says, "in some degree misleading to speak of Shakspeare, as is almost uniformly done, as a pure product of the Renaissance era. Stratford and its neighbourhood were, as has been shown, singularly eloquent of the English medieval spirit, of its religion, its land system, its municipal organisation, its drama. Prominent among the characteristics of that spirit were an ingrained conviction of the difference between social classes, a keen sense of the power attaching to the possession of land, a jealous desire of local influence and prestige, a reverence for custom, prescription, and law. These are the very qualities in Shakspeare which excite surprise, and they may be fairly put down in part to inherited tendencies and early associations."

These sentences will express a view which is not indeed novel, but which still needs to be insisted upon. The fault against which Mr. Boas is arguing here is that of failing to take a sufficiently wide and intelligent view of Shakspeare's relations to his time. A little farther on he dismisses with the contempt it deserves the "venerable prejudice" which refuses to treat him as historical at all, and views him rather, uncritically and absurdly, as "a stupendous phenomenon, to be accepted with awe and thanksgiving."

But Mr. Boas himself, it must be added, has not quite the courage of his opinions. Elsewhere, in a comparison between Greene and Shakspeare, he whispers, as it were with bated breath, that Shakspeare "can never be strictly called democratic." Neither strictly nor loosely can Shakspeare be called democratic. He knew human nature high and low, he could "feel what wretches feel," he could imagine the pang of the crushed beetle as well as that of the dying giant. But for the mob as ruling he had nothing but contempt. His multitude is always a mob, a "many-headed beast," a "rascal multitude." This deep-rooted opinion caused him, as Mr. Boas himself points out, to misinterpret Roman history, and to ascribe to the organised and temperate Roman plebs of the time of Coriolanus the attributes of a disorderly Elizabethan crowd. Shakspeare's recognition of the human qualities of individual members of the mob is not to the point, and in no way modifies his absolute denial to them of the qualities of government. He is not only not strictly democratic, but is most strictly and emphatically aristocratic. This seems to be Mr. Boas's own view; and his cautious phrase can hardly be more than a concession, probably unconscious, to the feelings of a time when the "rascal multitude" has come to be supreme. It would have been better and more convincing to point out that the forces acting upon Shakspeare were local and temporary, as well as permanent and universal forces, and that, therefore, his opinions upon government might not have been the same in the nineteenth century as they were in the sixteenth.

Mr. Boas is generally independent and penetrating, as well as sober in judgment. Occasionally, however, he is led to questionable conclusions from a desire to make Shakspeare conform to a preconceived ideal of what he ought to be, rather than from single-minded attention to what he is. This is a fault that few Shaksperian critics have avoided. Shakspeare is so great that there is a strong temptation to represent him as perfect: he has so many qualities that the first impulse is to ascribe to him all. Generally, therefore, the negative or fault-finding part of Shaksperian criticism is either neglected or done perfunctorily. As a rule, Mr. Boas is free from blame on this score. His remarks on Shakspeare's plots are almost always good. He points out the subtle merits of many of them, but he is fully conscious of the defects of others. Indeed, it may be questioned whether he does not once or twice exaggerate the defects inherent in romantic drama—as, for example, in his remarks on the long space of time covered by "Antony and Cleopatra." But, on the other hand, he is several times tempted, by a worship of genius which is far more a merit than a fault, to ascribe to Shakspeare virtues he does not possess, or to exaggerate those that are really his. This is especially the case in what he says about Shakspeare's handling of national character. Thus he treats "King Lear" as a play illustrative of the "uncontrollable and wayward passion," of the Celtic race; and he tells us that in "Macbeth" Shakspeare "pierced into the very heart of Highland romance." But is this true? Had Shakspeare the slightest desire to illustrate any particular characteristics of the Celtic race, or to penetrate to the heart of Highland romance? The evidence for the view is flimsy, and it seems to be negatived by the whole drift of Shakspeare's work. Human nature, embodied in this or that man or woman, is his subject-matter, not types or races. We may recognise Iago as an Italian; we may, if we please, call Lear's impulsiveness a Celtic trait; but we shall do well not to push this view too far. Othello, though he is evidently of Southern race, is not a study of Moorish character, for the sufficient reason that Shakspeare had not the means to make him so; and even Shakspeare could not make bricks without straw. If we view Macbeth as an embodiment of the imaginative nature of the Celt, must we consider Macbeth's creator a Celt too, seeing he had sufficient imagination to draw the character? The theory which makes imagination a specially Celtic trait has to account for the fact that not only the mixed English but the pure Teutonic Germans have produced greater poetry than any Celtic race. But, further, if these plays are illustrations of the Celtic nature, they must be so throughout. Is the iron will of Lady Macbeth a Celtic attribute? Is the harsh, repulsive cruelty of Goneril a Celtic vice? Is there anything in the least Celtic in the "stubborn taciturnity" of Cordelia herself? When Mr. Boas can only say of Kent—a Teuton if ever there was one—that he is "not without his share of Celtic impetuosity," we feel how weak his case is. Of Paulina, in "A Winter's Tale," he remarks, "Were she not warranted a Sicilian, we should take her to be a kinswoman of Kent in 'King Lear.'" Just so; and we should take both of them to be Teutonic English, for the simple reason that their creator "cared for none of these things." In "Macbeth,"

"the desolate storm-swept heaths, where the evil powers of earth and sky may fittingly meet and greet in hideous carnival; the lonely castles, where passions of primeval intensity find their natural home, and where, at dead of night, murder may stealthily move to its design; the eerie atmosphere, where the hoarse croak of the raven and the scream of the owl, the fatal bellman, foretell the impending doom, and where the wraith of the victim stalks to the head of the board in the assassin's banqueting hall"— these things are steeped, not "in the peculiar genius of Celtic Scotland," but in the colours of human passion. The wraiths and portents and the eerie atmosphere are not confined to the so-called Celtic plays alone. A wraith drives, or seeks to drive, the Dane Hamlet on to action; a wraith makes cold the blood of the Roman Brutus before Philippi; a series of wraiths sap the courage of the English Richard before Bosworth. There are always differences in the setting; but who can believe that there is anything peculiarly Celtic in the lonely castle and the shriek of the owl?

There is more justification in speaking of the Italian atmosphere of "Romeo and Juliet" and of the local colour of the "Merchant of Venice." But even here caution is necessary. To say that in Italy alone "amorous passion shot up with lightning swiftness into fever heat" is to forget the world in which Shakspeare lived. There is something of Italian vividness and suddenness in the whole Renaissance. "The reality of love at first sight," says Mr. Boas himself, "is an axiom in the Shaksperian drama"; and he well knows who was the "dead shepherd" whose saw was, "Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?" We have to remember this axiom, and the intensity characteristic of the age, in order to understand many of the changes, apparently without adequate motive, which occur in Shakspeare's plays. Mr. Boas analyses Gloucester's wooing of Anne, and pronounces it a masterpiece. It is a stumbling-block to many readers; and, whether it is a masterpiece or not, the conclusion would have seemed impossible except in a society to which the sudden growth of passion was as familiar as it is in Italy. The truth is, Shakspeare shows a sovereign indifference to what he considered mere details. That he could, and on occasion did, distinguish between the Celt and the Saxon, between the Jew or the Italian and the Englishman, is certain. But that he was specially careful on these points, and, above all, that he ever attempted to found a great tragedy on racial character, is exceedingly doubtful. His mingling of the stately Romans whom he took from the pages of Plutarch with the commons of his own time and country is a striking illustration of his indifference; and Mr. Boas's clear perception of this incongruity ought to have suggested caution in his judgment elsewhere. Perhaps the most valuable work that still remains possible to the Shaksperian critic is to clear away the lumber of ill-considered and mistaken praise. Unfortunately it is purely negative, and therefore unattractive work. But just as Malone covered with a coat of white the painted bust at Stratford, so, since the Shaksperian revival, the critics have been engaged in smoothing his literary features down to their conception of perfect beauty. But if ever literary figure could afford to be painted exactly as he was, with all his scars and wrinkles, Shakspeare can; and as surely as the face of Cromwell found redemption in the "valour and policy and public care written in all its princely lines," so surely will the plain truth about Shakspeare, revealing as it will supreme intellect and supreme imagination, most exalt him.

There are many other points on which it would be interesting to join issue with Mr. Boas, but the bare mention of a few must suffice. He seems to me to underrate the play of "King John," certainly one of the best, and perhaps the very greatest (except "Henry IV."), of the English historical plays. He misses a pretty obvious point in connexion with "Henry V.," when he ascribes to the King's personal charm the subsidy voted by the prelates. The opening scene very broadly hints that the primary object of their unprecedented liberality is to divert his attention from the Church. The argument on Falstaff's courage is an instance of a true conclusion based on premises doubtfully connected with it. Shakspeare, we may admit, did not intend to represent Falstaff as an absolute coward. But the plea that "Henry has no hesitation in procuring him a charge of foot in the Royalist army" proves nothing whatever, except that it pleased the dramatist to represent Henry as, in this instance, dead to his responsibilities and duties; and the "presence of mind" which leads the fat knight to counterfeit death in order to escape Douglas seems consistent with a very tolerable depth, or height, of cowardice. Again, Mr. Boas's explanation of the enigma of the character of Caesar in the play of "Julius Caesar" is eminently unsatisfactory.

"What picture of Caesar, as conqueror or statesman," he asks, "could have left so ineffaceable an impression of his unique place in the world's history as this awe-inspiring spectacle of his spirit—a silent, impalpable force—scattering destruction among his foes?"

None, perhaps. But this does not explain the enigma, the difference between the comparative pettiness of the spirit lodged in the body of Shakspeare's Caesar and the greatness of the historical figure. Does it not add the difficulty of reconciling this pettiness with the tremendous effects produced by the spirit after the assassination?

But the defects of Mr. Boas's book are far more than atoned for by the general excellence of the criticisms. The discussion of the Sonnets is good and helpful. So, though the conclusion may be questioned, is the treatment of the question of the authorship of "Titus Andronicus." The remarks on the use made by Gloucester of the death of Clarence are suggestive; and, with the exception already indicated, the whole treatment of "Julius Caesar" is very satisfactory. Mr. Boas, as a rule, rises with his theme; and, on the whole, he is most at home when handling topics of a somewhat sombre character. The passage on "Measure for Measure" is one of the best in the book.

The title of the volume is Shakspeare and his Predecessors. By far the greater part is, however, taken up with the treatment of Shakspeare, and this is also the best part. The preliminary chapters are sound and scholarly; but nowhere in them, except, perhaps, in the criticism of Marlowe, does the writer rise to the height he reaches afterwards. The exception is noticeable. Mr. Boas, like other critics, needs the stimulus of a great writer before he himself can write at his best.

HUGH WALKER.

Recollections of Paris. By Captain the Hon. D. Bingham. In 2 Vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

Of all the places in which the lines of the newspaper correspondent may be cast there is none so pleasant as Paris. It is a stage where the scenery is extensive and agreeable, where the actors are constantly changing and the play is of the most varied interest. Every Parisian, whatever be his origin, nationality, or colour, may hope to be an actor in some phase of the social comedy, sometimes streaked with tragedy, which is constantly being played before the public of the Ville-Lumière, even if his talents do not permit him to take a part on the great political stage. Other capitals besides Paris contain a large number of adventurers elbowed out of the dull respectability of provincial life; but in none other is there such a career open to the talents of vanity, none in which the personal element is so intense. Also the standard of what may be done without offending public opinion is very different in Paris from what it is in London. Hence the private life of public men scarcely affects their popularity, favourably or unfavourably; indeed, it might almost be said that a little scandal gives a piquancy to their career, which is not without its advantages. Long ago the French chose social liberty as preferable to political liberty; the Third Republic is trying to combine them, at least to overcome their incompatibility. In such a society the Paris correspondent of an English newspaper has a fine field, an exuberant pasture, not only as regards the present actors on the stage, but also as regards the past. For the better class of Paris newspapers, to say nothing of the reviews, are constantly giving essays on the personages—political, military, literary, scientific, and social—of the great restless period of French history, while the memoirs of the De Goncourts, of Maxime de Camp, and many others, are mines of anecdotes and good stories. If to the advantages of this repertory be added the talents of the interviewer, the opportunities of the man about town, and some knowledge of the French language and literature, the Paris correspondent has not only an easy task in his letters from Paris, but he can, if he please, accumulate these for republication in book form.

The two volumes of which the Honourable D. Bingham is the author consist of such letters, originally contributed to English newspapers, rather loosely tacked together into chapters, and too often uncorrected. The names of streets, such as Avenue of the King of Rome, betray the period of the original letters. Some of the chapters are of the flimsiest character. One, entitled "A Ball," is entirely occupied with the incident of a lady being called out of a quadrille to satisfy the hunger of her baby whom she had brought to the entertainment; another, on Irishmen, is devoted to dreary stories of some of the author's Bohemian fellow-countrymen in Paris. Much of the book is of this very miscellaneous character, yet there are good sketches of De Morny, Gambetta, and other politicians, also of ladies of various degree, from the Princess Mathilde to Cora Pearl, and incidentally of other celebrated or notorious persons—mostly echoes of the chronique scandaleuse of Paris during the past thirty years. Between these sketches of the Second Empire and the Third Republic is the story of the opening of the war, the Siege of Paris and the Commune occupying altogether nearly half of the book. The narrative is amusing and fairly correct. Evidence is given to show that the French, generally speaking—that is to say, Paris—were eager for the war against Prussia; there were exceptions, the Emperor, Prince Napoleon, General Ducrot, and Baron Stoffel, the French military attaché at Berlin, who in vain warned his government. "Whenever there appeared to be a chance of an amicable arrangement, the popular fury knew no bounds, and the ministry was called the Ministry of Shame." General Ducrot, in a letter quoted, gave warnings against the idea that the Alsations were so French as was supposed: "They are the true sons and grandsons of the same men who in 1815 sent deputations to the headquarters of the enemy demanding that Alsace should once more become German." However, since that time the fiction has been carefully cultivated that the Alsations were enthusiastically French, and that their language was French. They may have become French out of opposition, and have taken to speaking that language as the Welsh might take to speaking English supposing their country were taken by the French. Human nature has queer twists.

The story of the siege is good: but in reading this and other English diaries of besieged Paris, we—and especially the one of us who was a besieged resident—have always been struck by the apparent want of sympathy of the writers for the moral sufferings of the Parisians during the last two months of the siege. It is easy to echo the rather forced laugh of Paris housewives and restaurateurs at the feats they achieved at converting dogs, cats, and rats into savoury dishes, and to make fun of the devices used to procure some fuel, or to keep a lamp burning; but to the majority of the besieged the memory of those months is one of moral suffering far worse than the physical privation. In thousands of cases men, and women too, were living in utter ignorance as to the fate of their kith and kin who had left Paris on the approach of the invaders; families had been broken up, and for four months those remaining were without any news of those who had fled: they might be in want, or ill or dead. Many a Parisian made merry over his physical privations while his heart was bleeding at the thought of those dear to him, and of what might have happened to them.

The author's story of the Commune bears testimony to there being honest men in the movement. Indeed, excepting the pranks of a few cabotins, who were, after all, only continuing the ways of many officials of the Government of National Defence, the financial behaviour of the leaders compared favourably with that not unusual both before and after this episode of French history.

The recollections of Paris after the Commune include a more or less connected series of sketches of the Thiers, Macmahon, and Grévy presidencies. The tone is generally impartial. There is a fair account of the Bazaine trial; and the fullest credit is given to the stainless career of Marshal Macmahon. One passage shows the contrast between that fine old soldier and the ecclesiastic who afterwards became so popular, even in England, through his attempt to get up a crusade in Africa.

"When governor of Algeria, Macmahon wrote an admirable letter to Bishop Lavigerie, who wished to baptise and receive into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church the children of indigent parents who had died of starvation. I have unfortunately mislaid this letter; but it was a model of good taste and good feeling, and breathed an amount of religious toleration and sound political maxims which rather astonished the proselytising prelate."

On the whole, the political recollections are interesting and fairly correct; but they seem to be padded with later work of inferior character, showing some peculiar lapses of memory, both as to well-known facts and to well-known words. For an author who appears to have written several compilations on the personal part of French history to say—"In what did Ney's crime consist? In joining the army under Napoleon, on the eve of Ligny, to fight against the enemies of his country, instead of following Louis XVIII. to Ghent," gives us rather a shock. Whatever opinion be held about the execution of the sentence passed on Ney, it is certain that he was treated exceptionally because he had betrayed a trust voluntarily undertaken: he had gone over to Napoleon with the troops which he was leading to arrest the Emperor; and if the command of the wing he led at Quatre Bras was received by him only on the evening before the battle, that was simply because he had been looked on with suspicion, and even disgust, by Napoleon for his treachery to the Bourbons. The author always speaks of the semaine sanglante—the terrible week at the fall of the Commune—as the "semaine sanguinaire." This sudden failure of memory, in a generally correct narrative, and in generally correct quotations, shows itself singularly in the chapter on songs and epigrams, where two of the latter are given with extraordinary mistakes. The first, on Soubise's defeat by Frederick the Great, is full of errors; and in the second, the famous epigram on the Comte-Abbé de Clermont, the last line is quoted so incorrectly that the point of the epigram is lost both in the original and in the author's translation. Of course it should run:

"Moltié plumet, moltié rabat,
Aussi propre à l'un comme à l'autre,
Clermont se bat comme un apôtre,
Et sert son Dieu comme il se bat."

But the author gives the last line:

"Me sert Dieu comme il se bat," which is nonsense, and translates the last two lines, "Clermont fights like an apostle and serves God as he fights"; the point, that "he serves his God in the same way (that is, as badly) as he fights," being thus lost.

The faults of taste are more numerous and seem to indicate a deterioration in the letters. The description, so that their names can be guessed at once by every reader, of a prince and of a "young and lovely" duchess, friends of the author apparently, whom he meets in an American bar, to which the duchess informs him that they resort every day before dinner, shows that the traces of the society journal have not been effaced from the letters during their collection. Indeed, there is a flavour of Jeames's Diary about some parts of these Recollections. Four pages are filled with an account of "how commissions I am asked to execute have often cost me both time and money"; while the lords and ladies for whom the author has taken rooms and executed commissions are freely named. The old story about the Pope who spoke of Mio caro Paolo di Kock is put down to Pio Nono instead of to his predecessor, and is served with the remark "in the works of the French novelist, that 'to the English reader they appear too erotic and too dirty.'" We call to mind Chief Justice Cockburn's rebuke to Dr.

Kenealy in the course of the Tichborne trial: "You are mistaken: Paul de Kock sacrificed delicacy to humour, but he was not an immoral writer." However, there is no fear of the English reader who has enjoyed the "Demi-monde" and other very personal chapters of these Recollections, being scandalised by Paul de Kock; in the works of that humorous, though somewhat indelicate, writer virtue is always rewarded and vice punished, which is more than can be said for the scenes of the Parisian comédie humaine as chronicled by the author of these sketches. They may be of some use for references to personal history, but their value in this respect is much impaired by the absence of any index to the book.

EDWARD AND CECIL NICHOLSON.

The Island of Doctor Moreau. By H. G. Wells. (Heinemann.)

Two alternatives present themselves to the critical reader of this story: either Mr. Wells, more or less in the manner of Swift, has invented a strange race in a strange environment, to suggest certain criticisms and reflections on human life to-day, the conditions of society around us, the clash, in particular, between instinct and a morality imposed from the outside; or he has simply attempted to thrill the blood by a fantastically conceived tale of horror. The former, in the author of The Time Machine, seems the more probable; but if what he was intending was a serious piece of symbolism, he has hardly succeeded. The reader lacks the key to what is passing in the writer's mind, and only once does he catch a glimpse of any other meaning in the story than lies on its surface. That once is when Prendick, after considerable acquaintance with the Beast People of the island, comes to the conclusion that he has before him "the whole balance of human life in miniature, the whole interplay of instinct, reason, and fate, in its simplest form." The symbolism of "The Master-Builder" was hard to find, and it is never difficult to read ethical lessons of one sort and another into any narrative worth its salt; but if Mr. Wells's story has definite moral aim, the care with which it is concealed is in danger of stultifying its object.

"Strange as it may seem to the unscientific reader, there can be no denying that, whatever amount of credibility attaches to the detail of this story, the manufacture of monsters—and perhaps even of quasi-human monsters—is within the possibilities of science."

The words in parenthesis in this sentence, quoted from a brief note at the end of the book, give the theme of The Island of Doctor Moreau. It is not a pleasant theme, and "pleasant" is not an epithet to be applied to Mr. Wells's treatment of it. In a tract in narrative form against vivisection (which it certainly is not) the worst horrors of the tale would be justified. But as it is, any ordinarily fastidious reader cannot but be repelled at some of the descriptions of the Beast People. Here, for instance, the narrator, one Prendick, cast on the island after certain Defoe-like adventures, is describing his first close acquaintance with Dr. Moreau's creatures:

"He put out a strangely distorted talon, and gripped my fingers. The thing was almost like the hoof of a deer produced into claws. His face came forward and peered at my nails, came forward into the light of the opening of the hut, and I saw with a quivering disgust that it was like the face of neither man nor beast, but a mere shock of grey hair, with three shadowy overarchings to mark the eyes and mouth."

The art of the description here and elsewhere, the impression of abnormal horror produced by the fewest and the simplest words, is unmistakable; but to us, at least, it seems art not justified by its end. This Dr. Moreau, whose creatures people the island, Prendick recognises as a vivisector wedded to his work, who had been forced to leave London after public attention was called to his laboratory. "What could it mean?" Prendick asked himself. "A locked enclosure on a lonely island, a notorious vivisector, and these crippled and distorted men. . . ?" But if, as is of course possible, although I do not think it likely, Mr. Wells had it in his mind at the inception of this story to make the Beast People "crippled and distorted men," he flinched before the terror of the idea. Dr. Moreau's life-work has been, not experimentation on the human subject, but the discovery of the extreme limit of the plasticity of living forms. Here is a passage from his "explanation":

"You forget all that a skilled vivisector can do with living things. For my part I'm puzzled why the things I have done have not been done before. Small efforts, of course, have been made—amputation, tongue-cutting, excisions. . . . Those are trivial cases of alteration. Surgery can do better things than that. There is building up as well as breaking down and changing. . . . These creatures you have seen are animals carved and wrought into new shapes."

And so among the Beast People were leopard men, creatures made of hyaenas and swine, a bear tainted with dog and ox—"a complex trophy of Moreau's horrible skill"; and "there were three swine men and a swine woman, a mare-rhinoceros creature, and several other females whose sources I did not ascertain."

But these animals once formed had to be, so to speak, hypnotised, imbued with intelligence, with certain fixed ideas as to the universe around them, with instincts imposed to counteract the instincts surviving from their first shape. In the end, Moreau found, do what he would, these instincts broke out again, and conquered. Almost men when they first left his hands, his creatures soon became beasts again once they were loose on the island. But for a time he found it possible to secure their obedience; and one or two were so intelligent, that not only had they a considerable vocabulary, but they could act as the body servants of himself and his assistant. The most powerful factor in their domination was fear—fear of himself, the imposition of himself as a kind of deity, the Master of the House of Pain. He had taught them a series of prohibitions, called the Law, which they repeated continually, and the breaking of which they held in considerable dread :

“Not to go on all-Fours; that is the Law. Are we not Men?
 ‘Not to suck up Drink; that is the Law. Are we not Men?
 ‘Not to eat Flesh nor Fish; that is the Law. Are we not Men?
 ‘Not to claw Bark of Trees; that is the Law. Are we not Men?
 ‘Not to chase other Men; that is the Law. Are we not Men.’”

What ultimately happened to Moreau, and Montgomery, his one assistant; to the colony of Beast People; and to Prendick, the discoverer of “this biological station—of a sort,” is certainly worth reading. That the Beasts revert, the Law notwithstanding, was inevitable. Prendick finds in his wanderings about the island more and more bark clawed, and rabbits with their heads torn off; and it is in this reversion, a picture in little of the constant clash of instinct and of a more or less unnatural, unreasoned morality, that we fancy we see a glimmering of the parable Mr. Wells may have intended.

The art of the book, as we have said, is unmistakable. And, although a mass of detail is never obtruded, the effect of reality is much the same as Defoe reached with a far greater use of material. The drama moves naturally to its end; and, from the moment that Prendick sees, with a thrill, that his attendant has “pointed ears, covered with a fine brown fur,” it loses no whit of its impressiveness. Only here and there do the means by which horror is attained transcend the legitimate. The truth is, Mr. Wells has an unusually vivid imagination, which sometimes runs away with him. GRANT RICHARDS.

The Great Jester. By Morley Roberts. (Mentz, Kenner, & Gelberg.)

MR. RUSSELL has written so many fine stories of the sea that one expects from him a yarn of admirable merit. The present book is scrappy, being a mere bundle of anecdotes, each but a few pages long. That it were unfair to compare it with such sea-smelling masterpieces as A Sailor's Sweetheart or The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor' is obvious. But there is real merit in the little book, for here, as always when Mr. Clarke Russell speaks, the busy man is bound to listen.

Mr. Eugene Field was not the great writer and poet some would have us believe, but he had a pleasing talent and wrote with care and taste. Many of the defects in The Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac would have been remedied had its author lived to read the proofs. The matter is slight, but not altogether valueless. Mr. Robert Field's introduction is pathetic and interesting, but scarcely English.

Mr. Phillpotts, probably because I am stupid, did not make me laugh. His book seemed, indeed, the reverse of entertaining. Nor was there much wisdom to be gleaned from its pages, that are, surely, more good-humoured than humorous or sapient.

Marsena is a clever story, at once witty and pathetic, in an odd sort of way. Mr. Frederick always writes well, with a certain ease and distinction. He succeeds usually in the ironical manner, but here he scores in a pleasanter and not less difficult achievement. The ending is ironical enough, it is true; but the last chapter, clever as it is; seems somewhat abrupt and unnecessary.

The Flaw in the Marble is by a nameless author, who has no cause to be ashamed of his work. Lanthony, the sculptor, and Madeleine, the actress, are real people: they arouse our curiosity, pity, wonder. In a word, they live. Even so slight a sketch as Sœur Anne is deftly done: one has seen people like her, talked to them, loved them. That she is commonplace enough adds considerably to her fictional value. Simple folk generally make uninteresting figures in a novel. The story is capricious, illogical; but human life is that too. The style is elegant and at times firm. It is not a masterpiece, this story; for it is too morbid, too hesitating; where it should strike promptly. But it is woven of good qualities, with excellent care. The writer is an artist; and though portions, one thinks, might be better done, there is nothing ill done. And this tempered praise should herald complete success next time, for it would seem that experience only has been lacking.

Mrs. Dean's novel is even brilliant in many passages. Had she been content with these occasional flashes the result had been better. To be too clever is often not to be clever enough. But a great deal has been accomplished when a wronged hero is made attractive, since he is generally depicted as a sorry nincompoop. Here, though a quiet scholar, he is human and effective. The heroine is not without charm, and too shrewd to have given herself away as she does in the last chapter. The lover has nothing but his millions to recommend him. Again, it is hard to take this amusing book quite seriously, and Mrs. Philip Troy's last escapade is very serious indeed. Yet when all is urged that can be urged against the story, one fact remains: that Mrs. Dean is a really clever writer.

Mr. Hyne's book is tantalising. Adroit, startling, are adjectives even the exacting would affix to their most discriminative labels. Much is accomplished, truly; for the working up of the incident in each story is admirable. The fault hides always in the climax, and here a good deal is lacking every time. Mr. Hyne can describe a scene vigorously, he can put colour and life into the most insignificant descriptions. But the rarer art of hinting, of making the reader fill in the final blank—and he insists on leaving these dangerous spaces—is not yet his. When he has acquired this accomplishment, he should be a great writer of the short story. Judged by the sternest standards, he is more than superficially competent. He has much to learn, but only the most promising arrive within measurable distance of the goal he has already reached.

Mrs. Newton's novel is not exciting; but it is always interesting to read of real people, and her characters are not mere dummies. One grows inquisitive concerning their commonplace futures, sympathetic over their everyday sorrows, happy in sharing their simple pleasures. On the whole, this is definite and enviable praise; for a large percentage of novels nowadays are either nasty or silly, or both.

Mr. Ernest Rhys writes: “It is as a tale-teller I would like to be judged, if at all.” He has tried to describe the adventures of the fiddler of Carne, who came by the sea, and went by the sea, whose origin and final destiny were alike unknown. He tells his tale well, on the whole. But it is rather long-winded; and some of the incidents and characters, especially those relating to the hall where dwell Lord Carne and his unpleasant daughters, are amateurish and stupid. For the rest, there is only praise. The frequenters of the inn are most humourously and truly described, while the last chapter is weird and impressive.

Mr. Upward has written a story of great merit. Some of the writing is almost as good as the story. The life and sad fate of a certain king of Francoonia, his endeavours to remedy the afflictions of his people, his subsequent alleged madness, imprisonment, and suicide, are related with a remarkable simplicity, directness, and strength. The intrigues of the court, that envelop and capture the unlucky monarch, are most deftly revealed. The characters are well drawn, the king himself, Johann the Socialist, and the old chancellor, notably so. The book has only one conspicuous fault. Surely it were worth while to make clear the reason of Bernal's treachery? The musician whose genius was fostered by the king, whom the king loved and honoured above all men, should have played a nobler part. His unexpected, unexplained conduct mars one's enjoyment of the really masterly closing chapters.

Mr. Derechiff has succeeded neatly in a delicate task. It is never easy to translate well, and of all French novelists Gyp's charm, wit, irony, pathos are the most subtle. Ginette's Happiness is a delightful story, and loses little of its original freshness in its new form. Mr. Derechhoff could scarcely covet a higher compliment.

The Folly of Eustace is not a good tale: the idea is clever, but the writing is clumsy and dull. The other stories that make up the volume are familiar to magazine readers. They are, as one would expect, rather above the average of this class of work.

The Great Jester is a most powerful collection of stories. Their author has never done anything so thrilling and convincing, which is saying a very great deal; for in his own manner—rough, nay, often cruelly brusque and frank as it is—he has no rival. It would be unfair to select any one tale as being better than its companions; but "A Good Woman" is the most relentlessly terrible. To do such a book justice in a paragraph were impossible, the bare attempt impertinent. Yet a longer notice would probably be equally impotent. After all, to say that these stories are absolutely good, unerring in their sincerity and strength, is but to utter the naked truth; and a column of elegant laudation would only proclaim, less clearly, the same verdict.

PERCY ADDLESHAW.

A CRITICAL EDITION OF THE CANZONIERE OF PETRARCH.

Le Rime di Francesco Petrarca. Restituite nell'ordine e nella lezione del testo originario . . . da Giovanni Messica. Edizione critica. (Firenze: Barbèra.)

WE must content ourselves at present with briefly calling the attention of our readers to the present work, which is one of considerable importance, and represents the first attempt to give a really critical text of the Italian poems, or Canzoniere, of Petrarch, based on a comparison of the MSS.—some of which are autographs of the poet—and also of the oldest editions. Our reason for not submitting the work to a more detailed examination is that, by the confession of the editor himself, it is at present incomplete. He had prepared, he tells us, a "proemial discourse" of some two hundred pages, but withheld it at the last minute owing to considerations of space, reserving it for publication with other matter bearing on these poems in another volume.

In taking this course the learned editor was, we venture to think, ill-advised. We believe he might have published his "proemial discourse" of two hundred pages without appreciably increasing the bulk of the present volume. And for this reason—a well considered and carefully planned introduction would have enabled him to dispense with nine-tenths of his critical notes. For at least that proportion of the notes have to do not with substantial differences of reading, but with questions of spelling, of elision or non-elision of syllables, of composition or separation of preposition and article, &c. In all these points the tendency of later scribes and editors is naturally to assimilate the text of their author to the practice of their own time. Now we do not mean to assert that the restitution of the true text of Petrarch in these respects is unimportant. Very far from it. The points taken separately may be small points, but accuracy is not a small point; and even where the sense is not altered the rhythm may be sensibly affected; and that in the case of such an artist in words as Petrarch is no light matter. Still almost all these readings admit of being classified and grouped; and if in the introduction the editor, when describing the MSS., had given an account of their practice in these respects, with statistics as to the relative frequency with which different spellings, &c., occur, so as to show the tendency of Italian orthography at the different periods, we should have had all that is really necessary. We do not profess to have made an exhaustive examination of the book; we have only taken a few poems here and there at random as specimens. But, so far as our examination has gone, we have only come across one instance in which the sense is perceptibly affected by the new reading: namely, the substitution of "pensando" for "passando" in the second line of Sonnet cxxix.

Many, too, of the notes suffer terribly from that want of condensation which Matthew Arnold, in one of his Essays, noticed as common to many Italian and most German writers, and attributed in both cases to the absence until recent times of the pressure of a strong and united national life. We wish there were more indications than we discern at present that the national unity of Italy and Germany were effecting an improvement in this respect.

An important change rightly made by Signor Messica is the restoration of the original division of the Canzoniere into two parts, instead of the artificial arrangement favoured by recent editors of "Sonetti e Canzoni in vita di Madonna Laura," "Sonetti e Canzoni in morte di Madonna Laura," "Sonetti e Canzoni sopra vari argomenti." According to the true arrangement, the division between the parts is formed, not by the death of "Madonna Laura" in 1348, but by the so-called conversion of the poet in 1343.

Students of Petrarch will do well in future to base their studies on Signor Messica's text, though those of us who first learnt to know our Petrarch in other editions need not be inconsolable.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. have in preparation a new book by Mr. Andrew Lang, to be entitled Pickle the Spy, "disclosing the Treasons of A—M—, Esq., of G—; also of James Mohr Macgregor, and Macalister, an Irishman. With the Secret Amours and Misfortunes of H.R.H. Charles, P— of W—. Drawn from the Cabinets of the late Elector of Hanover, and of their French and Prussian Majesties." This book is not a novel, though it contains the materials of romance. The subject is the mysterious disappearance of Prince Charles from February 28, 1749, practically till his father's death in 1766. These years, especially 1749-1756, were occupied in European hide-and-seek. The ambassadors and courts of Europe and the spies of England were helpless, till in 1750 a Highland chief of the highest rank sold himself to the English Government. The book contains his unpublished letters and information, with those of another spy, James Mohr Macgregor, Rob Roy's son. These, combined with the Stuart Papers in Her Majesty's Library at Windsor, the letters from English ambassadors in the State Papers, the political correspondence of Frederick the Great, and the French Archives, illuminate a chapter in secret history. The singular story of Macalister the spy also yields some facts; and the whole exhibits the last romance of the Stuarts, and the extremes of loyalty and treason.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has in the press a volume commemorating the connexion of the late Chester Maonaghten with the Rajkumar College in Kathiawar, of which he was the founder and for many years principal. It will consist of a collection of his addresses to the pupils, who are all scions of the Rajput families ruling in Kathiawar, with a biographical introduction by Mr. Robert Whitelaw.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish immediately a Birthday Book, consisting of selections from the writings of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, with twelve illustrations by his father.

MR. JOHN LANE proposes to add shortly three more volumes to his series of outdoor books entitled "The Arcady Library," which began last year with Round about a Brighton Coach Office. They will be—Scholar Gipsies, by Mr. John Buchan, with seven etched illustrations by Mr. D. Y. Cameron; Life in Arcadia, by Mr. J. S. Fletcher (the editor of the series), with twenty illustrations by Mr. Patten Wilson; and A Garden of Peace, by Miss Helen Crofton, illustrated by Mr. Edmund H. New, who has drawn architectural and other designs for the serial edition of The Compleat Angler.

MR. JAAKOFF PRELOOKER, author of an autobiographical volume entitled Under the Czar and Queen Victoria, which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of January 11, is now engaged upon an Anglo-Russian romance, to be called Palasha and Masha, which narrates the story of two sisters, daughters of Russian nonconformist parents, one of whom marries an English nobleman. The author claims that the tragic incidents are real episodes in the struggle for religious and civil liberty, which has been going on in Russia during the last quarter of a century. We may add that he has previously written two novels of the same kind: Rabbi Shalom on the Shores of the Black Sea (Odessa, 1869), and "Trishka and Vasutka," which appeared last year, with illustrations, in the Sunday Magazine.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. have in preparation an Illustrated Guide to London. The work will include: "Where to Stay and how to Live in London"; "How to Get About London"; "An Itinerary for London"; "The Diversions of London"; "The Streets and Sights of London"; "Up and Down the Thames"; "London, Past and Present," &c. It will be fully illustrated, and published at sixpence.

MESSRS. T. & J. MANSON, of Lerwick, announce a translation of Ploven's Reminiscences of Shetland, Orkney, and Scotland, being the record of a voyage paid to this country in the summer of 1839, by a former Amtmand and Commandant in the Faroe Isles.

THE June number of Cosmopolis (Fisher Unwin) will contain the address which Prof. Edward Dowden recently delivered to the English Goethe Society, entitled "The Case against Goethe"; an appreciation of the Italian novelist, Signor Antonio Fogazzaro, written in French, by Prof. de Gubernatis; and a criticism of Ibsen, by M. Francisque Sarcey. The approaching jubilee of Free Trade will also be celebrated in a series of articles, by Mr. Henry Dunkley ("Verax"), M. Paul Leroi Beaulieu, and Dr. Theodor Barth (a member of the Reichstag).

A NEW company, of which Mr. W. Moxon Browne and Mr. J. Edwin Pitter are managing directors, has purchased the stock, copyrights, and goodwill of the well-known publishing firm of Messrs. Griffith, Farran & Co., and will continue the business at the old address in Charing Cross-road. The title of the new company is Griffith, Farran, Browne & Co., Limited.

TO-MORROW (Sunday) Mr. Leslie Stephen, president of the London Ethical Society, will deliver a lecture at Essex Hall, Strand, on "War."

DURING Wednesday and Thursday of next week Messrs. Sotheby will be engaged on one of those libraries which show on every page the taste of the collector—in this case, Mr. Alfred Crampon, of Paris. He specially devoted himself to first editions and rare opuscula of the English poets, from Spenser down to Mr. Swinburne. Here may be seen both volumes of The Faerie Queene, the tallest known copy of the fourth folio of Shakspeare, the first edition of Paradise Lost (with the first title-page), a unique octavo of The Deserted Village, the rarest things of Byron, Shelley's Address to the Irish People, a presentation copy of Wordsworth's Grace Darling, a large paper copy of Poems by Two Brothers, Coleridge's Poems on Various Subjects (with his receipt for the copyright inserted), the first edition of The Raven and other Poems (with MS. corrections by Poe), Browning's Pauline; and also first editions of the several volumes of Robinson Crusoe and of Tristram Shandy.

THE free libraries committee of the Moss Side urban district council, of which Mr. William E. A. Axon is chairman, have issued an appeal for help in money or books, in order to start their new library successfully. Mr. Axon himself promises 250 volumes, three others 100 volumes each, and so on. But the most interesting feature in the scheme is the proposal to commemorate two great English writers closely connected with the locality: Thomas De Quincey, whose childhood was passed within a stone's throw of where the library will stand; and Mrs. Gaskell, the author of Mary Barton. It is hoped to get together a collection of all that these two have written, whether in books or in periodicals, of all the translations of their works, and also of autographs, personal relics, portraits, and other illustrative material. Mrs. Baird Smith, a daughter of De Quincey, has already offered to give some books and a photograph of her father. In this connexion, our readers may remember that Mr. Axon published about a year ago a careful bibliography of both Mr. and Mrs. Gaskell.

WE have received—somewhat late—the fourteenth annual report of the American Dante Society for 1895. It contains the usual list of additions to the Dante collections in the library of Harvard College, compiled by Mr. W. C. Lane, which almost takes the place of a Dante bibliography. We notice the gift of no less than twenty editions of Cary's translation, which have been published in the United States, the earliest in 1822. The report is rendered permanently valuable by a contribution from Prof. Charles Eliot Norton, who has been president of the society since the death of Mr. Lowell. He has printed, to illustrate passages in the Divina Commedia, a series of extracts from the little known Chronicle of Fra Salimbene, which was written circa 1280, but not published until 1857. There is also here reprinted the letter from the Rev. Dr. E. Moore, on "A Variant in the Vita Nuova"—"Arabia" for "Italia" in § xxx.—which appeared in the ACADEMY of December 1, 1894.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE following is the list of those upon whom it is proposed to confer the honorary degree of D.C.L. at the Encaenia to be held at Oxford on June 24: Mr. Bayard (the United States ambassador), Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. John Morley, Sir Archibald Geikie, Mr. W. B. Richmond, R.A., and Prof. E. B. Cowell (of Cambridge).

THE Marquis of Salisbury, as chancellor of the university of Oxford, has appointed Lord Halsbury to the office of High Steward, which has been vacant since the death of the Earl of Selborne. Before him it had been held since 1859 by the Earl of Carnarvon.

ON Thursday next a grace will be submitted to the Senate at Cambridge, proposing a fresh list of names for the syndicate to inquire generally into the question of degrees for women. It will be remembered that last term a grace was passed unanimously for the appointment of such a syndicate, but that a second grace containing certain names was rejected by a majority of 186 votes to 171. Meanwhile, two counter-memorials have been in circulation among members of the Senate at Cambridge. One, deprecating the admission of women to any degree, has received 2010 signatures; while the other, proposing that women should receive some title not implying membership of the university, has received 1364 signatures.

IT is announced that the Reade (sic) Lecture at Cambridge will be delivered by Prof. J. J. Thomson on June 10, the subject that he has chosen being "Röntgen Rays." We adopt the orthography several times repeated in the University Reporter; but hitherto we have always seen the name of the founder written as Sir Robert Rede. It is also proposed that the lecture shall be given, not in the Senate House, but in the new lecture room of anatomy and physiology—we presume for the convenience of scientific illustrations.

ON Tuesday of this week the Junior Scientific Club gave a conversazione in the University Museum at Oxford, when Prof. Silvanus P. Thomson delivered a lecture on "Luminescence," and apparatus and experiments were exhibited illustrating recent progress in various departments of natural science. On Tuesday next Prof. W. Ramsay will deliver the fifth Robert Boyle Lecture before the same society, his subject being "Argon and Helium, the two newly Discovered Gases."

AT the last meeting of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, a paper was read by the secretary on "The Chapel of Caius College," showing that the old walls built in 1393, now hidden by ashlar, were the earliest known example of the use of brick at Cambridge.

WE observe that there are only two candidates for the new honour school of English at Oxford—the same number as for the Oriental school. As regards the other final schools, the figures are: classics, 143; modern history, 119; law, 90; natural science, 50; theology, 39; and mathematics, 22.

WE quote the following from the annual report of the curators of the Indian Institute at Oxford:

"The valuable collection of about 3000 volumes, presented by Sir M. Monier-Williams, has been arranged according to subjects in its final place in the library, occupying the whole of the wall facing the windows in Broad-street. The Malan books have been transferred to and almost entirely fill the shelves of the large front room in the basement, which now forms an annexe to the library, being connected with it by a spiral staircase. The volumes which form the general library have been re-arranged in such a manner that all works directly connected with India occupy the five compartments near the windows, while all books which treat of non-Indian Eastern languages or are of a more general character, such as the journals of Oriental societies or works on religion and mythology, are placed in the gallery. The card-catalogue taken in hand at the beginning of the year had by its close progressed far enough to include all the Sanskrit and Pali books, as well as those which deal with the geography, history, and archaeology of India. The library has been increased by the purchase of a larger number of books than in any previous year. It has also been enriched by valuable donations on the part of Mr. H. Baden Powell, and Mr. W. A. Symonds, late of the Madras Civil Service."

TRANSLATION.

TO HIS LADY.

(From the French of Pierre de Ronsard.)

WHEN you are very old, and by the candle's flame, Sitting beside the fire, you talk and spin and sing

My songs o' nights, then you will say, half wondering:
"Ronsard in bye-gone days hath sung my beauty's fame."

When those around thee hear this word, no serving dame

Of thine, already at her task half slumbering,
But at the echo of my name awakening,
With everlasting praise shall rise and bless thy name.

But I, a formless ghost within the earth full deep,
Beneath the myrtle shadows I shall lie asleep; Whilst thou before the fire art crouching, old and grey,

Weeping for my lost love and for thy proud disdain.

Wait not the morrow but live now, if thou wilt deign

To hear me; pluck the roses of thy life to-day.

E. R. BARKER.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for April opens with an enthusiastic appreciation, by Fernandez Duro, of Mr. Clements Markham's labours in translating the work of the early Spanish navigators to the Americas, and especially of the "Narratives of the Voyages of Pedro Sarmien to de Gamboa to the Straits of Magellan." Don Roque Chabas is also highly praised by Manuel Danvila for his annotated edition of the inedited "Antigüedades de Valencia," by Fray José Teixedor, a writer of the last century. In another paper, he claims for Charles III., when King of Naples, the credit of commencing the excavations at Herculaneum and Pompeii with Spanish engineers. Rodriguez Valla continues his important letters of Francisco de Rojas, the ambassador of Ferdinand the Catholic. Incidentally, in 1504, is mentioned the application to the Pope for the dispensation for the marriage of Henry VIII. Two Visigothic inscriptions of the sixth and seventh centuries are commented on by Padre Fita. We are told that the Arabic MSS. of Señor Gayangos are now arranged in the library of the Real Academia.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ANAEMIC BIRTH.

Reform Club: May 23, 1896.

The most important portion of the Gospel of Peter was undoubtedly that relating to the Nativity—there the keynote of Docetism must have been struck—and no excuse is needed for the following attempt to recover this lost section, and to ascertain its value.

Let us consider what we have to look for. The Docetists, as we know, taught that Christ's body was unreal—bloodless. It was apparently against this view that some early copyists inserted in our Third Gospel that passage—missing in so many MSS., appealed to by Anti-Docetists so often—about the sweat of blood. The intention is clearer in the case of our Fourth Evangelist, when he declares that Christ came "not with the water only, but with the water and the blood," and insists on the issue of blood and water from Christ's side so vehemently—"An eye-witness vouches for it, one thoroughly trustworthy, and who is positive about his fact." Later on we find copyists, similarly motivated, endeavouring to foist into Matthew both this issue of blood and water, and also the sweat of blood.

Things being so, it certainly follows that our Lord's birth, according to the Docetist Evangelist, must have been altogether illusory. "You [Docetists] are horrified at the infant shed into life with the accompanying embarrassments," exclaims Tertullian; and he mentions "Through a virgin, but not of a virgin," as one of their formulae (see De Carne Christi). Irenaeus and the author of Adversus omnes haereses explain the Docetist doctrine still more forcibly as "that Christ passed through Mary as water through a tube." We know, too, that the Docetists relied on Isaiah liv. 1; lxvi. 7: "Thou that didst not travail"; "Before she travailed she brought forth." And they seem to have given particular attention to a passage in the lost Apocalypse of Ezekiel, quoted by Tertullian, Hippolytus, and Clement of Alexandria—"a heifer [cf. 1 Samuel xvi. 2] brought forth, yet did not bring forth."

We know, then, what we have to expect, and, as a matter of fact, we have two narratives of the Nativity, both probably dating from before the middle of the second century, which answer to all the pseudo-Peter's requirements—the one given in the Ascensio Isaiae (a document otherwise known to be indebted to pseudo-Peter), and the other in the Protevangelium. My suggestion is that pseudo-Peter lurks behind them.

The relationship between the Ascensio and the Protevangelium is at first sight extremely perplexing. In the essential point that Christ's birth was painless and bloodless they agree. They agree as to Mary's Davidic descent. They agree as to Joseph's silence about his dream, and his inability at first to perceive the newborn Infant. The phrase "He guarded her" is common to both. Pseudo-Isaiah's "He glorified God because the Lord had come into his portion," is curiously like the Protevangelist's "He glorified the God of Israel because He had given him this grace." In both narratives the Infant's appearance is followed by a heavenly voice enjoining secrecy. In both there is a mention of midwifery; but whereas in the Ascensio the point is that to the surprise of the neighbourhood midwives were not called in at all, the Protevangelist makes his point by bringing them on the scene in order to discover their services unnecessary.

Clearly there is some intimate connexion between the Ascensio and the Protevangelium, but whether direct or indirect is not quite clear. It appears to me that the result is very similar in either case: that if the one is under obligation to the other, the debt is to the Ascensio, and that if both made common use of a previous document this common document is better represented in the Ascensio. Notice that at all points the Ascensio narrative is infinitely simpler, and that its plain, brief suggestions are amplified and embellished in the Protevangelium. When the latter makes the heavenly voice enjoin secrecy "until the Child has come to Jerusalem," the original point of the injunction seems lost. Notice, too, that the Ascensio follows St. Matthew's narrative exclusively—Mary and Joseph are quietly in their own house at Bethlehem when the

* I am assuming the obligation of pseudo-Ignatius to the Protevangelium. Here are the two passages: "A star shone forth above all the other stars, and all the rest of the stars formed a chorus to this star. And its light was exceedingly great above them all. And there was agitation felt as to whence this new spectacle came. . . . Henceforth all things were in a state of tumult."—Ep. ad Eph. "A great star shining among these stars and obscuring their light so that these stars did not appear. . . . I saw the sky astonished. . . . All things were in a moment driven out of their course. . . . And there was a great tumult in Bethlehem."—Protevangelium 18, 21

Infant suddenly appears. And it is surely as a result of introducing a foreign idea, of representing the birth as taking place in the solitude of a journey, that the Protevangelist, unable to avail himself of any comments of the neighbourhood, replaces them by actually bringing midwives on the scene.

Let us next consider what light is thrown on the subject by Justin. Justin's relationship to the Protevangelium is close.

1. "Thou shalt conceive of the Holy Spirit," Apol. 33. (cf. "Thou shalt conceive of the Logos"—v.l. "of the Holy Spirit," Protevangelium 11). Justin proceeds to identify "the Holy Spirit" here mentioned with the Logos.

2. "Shall be called Son of the Highest: and and thou shalt call His name Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins." Apol. 33; Protevangelium 11.

3. "The Spirit of the Lord would come upon her," Tryph. 100. "The power of the Lord shall overshadow thee," Protevangelium 11.

4. Justin and the Protevangelist agree in omitting "the throne of David," "the house of Jacob," &c.

5. Both have as a result of the Annunciation χαρὰν δὲ λαβούσα Μαρίαν.

6. Both mention a cave as the scene of the Nativity; the Protevangelist, however, introduces it on the way to Bethlehem, and Justin, more agreeably with Luke, after the failure to find room there.

7. Both bring the Magi to this cave, making them arrive the night of the Nativity, and thus usurp the place of the Shepherds.

Critics are now agreed that Justin employed the Gospel of Peter pretty considerably on other occasions; but, with the above list of coincidences in view, we are left in doubt whether he had not resort to the Protevangelium as well. It is especially difficult to derive the "cave" from pseudo-Peter, if the inferences above drawn from the Ascensio as to his peculiar relationship to Matt. i., ii. be admitted. Justin's use of the Protevangelium, however, explains his references only partially. We have to look elsewhere for the source of the "yokes and ploughshares" which he says that our Lord made—no mere embellishment of Justin's, for they are also mentioned in the Gospel of Thomas. We have to look elsewhere for "Arabia" as the starting-point of the Magi: as Justin repeats Arabia about a dozen times, and goes out of his way to prove its conformity to prophecy, it is not very likely to be a gloss of his own. Nor does the Protevangelium explain Justin's coincidence with the Ascensio—"Then Joseph did not put her away" (Tryph. 78). On the whole, it seems a reasonable explanation that Justin used pseudo-Peter's narrative of the Nativity and pseudo-James's side by side.

Whatever doubt may be felt as to the application of various details, one fact, the most important of all, stands out as almost certain: that the painless anaemic birth of the Protevangelium and the Ascensio is substantially pseudo-Petrine.

The effect of pseudo-Peter's narrative was immense. He did not succeed in increasing the canon, but, directly or indirectly, he added a new article to the creed. At the beginning of the third century Clement of Alexandria informs us that there were still some who imagined that Mary had been in the puerperal state—he might have reckoned Tertullian in the number—but this is the last that is heard of such views among the orthodox (Stromata vii. 16). The midwife's certificate was received, "A virgin hath brought forth and a virgin she remains."

* As supplying a possible origin of the "cave," may I point out the close resemblance between the Hebrew words for "cave" and "manger" אורה אורה and מערה מערה.

How strangely different the ultimate effect of pseudo-Peter's narrative from the intention with which it was put forward! The original intention, we can scarcely doubt, was to represent Christ as taking no substance from Mary, and, therefore, altering nothing in His passage through. "Not sprung from the womb, but coming down from high heaven," sang the Docetist Sibyl (Acta Apocrypha, ed. Lipsius, p. 72). "Andrap, andrap" prophesies another. But Docetism could not ultimately shake the motherhood of Mary; and so it came to pass that the anaemic birth, first put forward with the intention of robbing her, becomes, as it passes into orthodoxy, material for her aggrandisement. Thenceforward she is ἀειπαρθένος.

But though Docetism could not shake the maternity of Mary, it shook the paternity of Joseph effectually; for, however strange it may at first appear to some ears, the fact must be admitted, as Mr. Conybeare recently pointed out in the ACADEMY, that early Christendom saw no incongruity between virgin motherhood and human fatherhood. Here are the facts: (1) According to pseudo-Matthew, Joachim begets Mary after five months' separation from his wife and when a month's journey distant. (2) Philo mentions six cases of women who conceived parthenically, namely, Eve, Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Leah, Zipporah—two of these instances being corroborated in Book of Jubilees xvi., and the Testament of Issachar—but there is not the slightest intention of eliminating relationship to Abraham, Jacob, &c. In the face of these analogies, the only direct ones we possess, the burden of proof lies with those who would maintain that our Evangelists intended something different. (3) Both in Matt. i., ii. and Luke i. 5-ii. Christ's Davidic descent through Joseph is involved no less clearly than Mary's virginity, and in neither case has criticism succeeded in deriving the two ideas from different layers (Matt. i. 16, 18; Luke i. 27, 32). (4) There are clear historical traces of concurrent belief in Joseph's fatherhood and Mary's virginity. Thus the Nazarenes are said to admit Mary's virginity, while denying Christ's pre-existence (Eusebius, H. E. iii. 27), and so are the two Theodotean sects (Hippolytus, Philosoph. vi. 23; Tertullian, Adv. omnes haereses viii.). The denunciations of Gregory Thaumaturgus and others, against the view that Christ was "of human seed by the virgin," can scarcely have been shot at large. And in the History of Joseph the Carpenter, while Mary's virginity is admitted fully, Joseph is still Christ's "Father after the flesh."

When we calmly consider all the facts just mentioned, it seems not unreasonable to conclude that, before the great wave of Docetism passed over Christendom, Joseph and the Virgin stood side by side. When the wave has passed, we find Mary standing alone; and though other causes may have co-operated—e.g., the fact that Mary had survived to occupy a very high position in the early Christian community (see Luke i. 48)—it appears probable that this result was mainly due to Docetism in general and pseudo-Peter in particular. The older view still lingers, but it has become unorthodox. No Protevangelist will now come forward with a "Gospel of the Nativity of Joseph." And Joseph will be accorded the honours of an Assumption only partially.

Oxford: April 20, 1896.

It was the late Dr. Richard Morris who first pointed out the similarity between Chaucer's Person's Tale and Frère Lorens' Somme des Vices et des Vertues. Since his calling attention to it, the likeness has been dwelt on by various editors and scholars. In 1882 it was made the subject of a German dissertation by W. Eilers, who gave a detailed comparison of the two. This was afterwards translated and published by the Chaucer Society (Essays, part v., 16). The evidence presented by Eilers, however, despite the fact that it has been generally accepted, is not sufficient, when carefully analysed, to show anything more than that Chaucer put into the mouth of his Parson such theology as was current at the time, some of which he may have derived from Lorens.

A few days ago, while trying to find in the Bodleian Library a MS. of Lorens' tract, it was my good fortune to come upon a volume of old French sermons which are in some respects more similar to the Person's Tale than Lorens' Somme. The subjects are treated in the same order and in the same general style as that used by Chaucer, but in an order and style quite different from that of the Somme. It is clear from the date of the MS. that the book could not have been compiled from the Person's Tale. The Manuscript Catalogue of MSS. Bodley (compiled by Mr. Madan) dates the MS. in the second half of the thirteenth century. It is thus not only impossible that it should have been elaborated out of the Person's Tale, but it is also quite probable that it antedates Lorens' Somme, written in 1279.

Unfortunately the tract is not complete, but breaks off abruptly in the middle of the second part of "De Confessione," though the rubric prefixed to the subject outlines a complete treatment of it such as is found in the Person's Tale and in Lorens. The part on Confession, too, begins: "[D]e repentance deuant dit suom; ore oez iaci de la sainte confession; " which seems to imply that a treatise on Repentance was originally prefixed to the sermons on the Seven Deadly Sins. It is also evident from the rubrics that two paragraphs of one of the chapters on Pride have dropped out. The book is written in the form of sermons, each division being prefaced by a rubric: "Isci comence un especial sermon de orgoil," &c. "Isci comence un especial sermon de enuie," &c.

It seems especially fitting that Chaucer should have put such subject matter into the mouth of his Parson; but did he get it from this tract? When we come to consider the passages given below, it is very tempting to answer this question in the affirmative. We must remember all the while, however, that such subject matter, as well as the method in which it was handled, was more or less common property among the medieval doctors. It is quite possible, therefore, that Chaucer borrowed neither from Frère Lorens nor from the author of these sermons, but from some abridgment which had features in common with both.

To discuss this question with the fulness which it deserves would exceed the limits of a letter of this kind, so I will content myself with pointing out a few of the more striking similarities.

CH. SIX-TEXT, I 388. MS. BODL., 90, FOL. 1.
(Ellesmere MS.)

Of the route of this Orgoil done est com-vij synnes, thanne, is encement e racine de Pride, the general route touz autres pechez.
of alle harmes.

Here the "thanne" which seems superfluous in Chaucer's sentence is quite necessary in the French, for the author first gives an outline of how he is going to treat his subject, and the "done" recalls him to a statement he makes at the outset, to the effect that he will first treat of pride. Chaucer uses comencement, too, in 387:

"Now been they cleped Chieftaynes for as much as they been chief and springe of alle othere synnes"—

i.e. "comencement de touz autres pechez." These similarities, however, may be mere coincidences.

These passages, which are all chosen from the beginning of the French tract, will serve to illustrate its likeness to the Person's Tale. I hope to be able in a succeeding letter to give further instances of the same sort, taken from the body of the tract.

MARK LIDDELL.

* So Hengwrt. Elism. has springen. (Dd., Gg., and Co. Groups are not represented in Six-Text.) Harl. 7335 has springers, but as MSS. of Pe. Group and Seld., &c., have springen, it is probable that springers is peculiar to Harl. 7335; anyhow there is no such word in English. The reading is therefore springe (O.E. spring = "beginning"), to which the other scribes have added an n, probably having supposed it to be the verb springen.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "LOOP."

Cambridge: May 23, 1896.

It is curious that the etymology of "loop" is still unexplained. The suggestions in the dictionaries are most unsatisfactory. The usual etymology in modern dictionaries is from the Celtic (Irish and Gaelic) lub, "to bend." This is most unlikely, as our Celtic words are few, and are ever diminishing; and it is unhistorical, because the sense of "hole," as in "loop-hole," is much older than that of "bend in a string." Moreover, I suppose the u would come out as the u in "lubber," if short, and as the ow in "brown" (A.S. brūn), if long.

Dr. Johnson, following Skinner, and Skinner following Minsheu, derive it from the Dutch loopen, "to run"; but they give rather unsatisfactory reasons for their belief. Skinner says, "loop-hole, quasi leap-hole, a hole through which you can make your escape." But anyone who did succeed in getting through a loop-hole would be much more like to break his neck than to get away. Minsheu tells us to compare Lat. transenna, "a net," because one's sight can pass through it; but this etymology from transire may be doubted. He also tells us to consider the etymology of French rayère, from Lat. radius.

I quote these ideas because I think they help us after a remote fashion. Cotgrave gives Fr. rayère, "a loop-hole; a long and narrow cleft in the wall of a prison, dungeon, or tower, whereby light and aire (though very little) are let into the rooms thereof." However, the etymology from Dutch loopen will not serve, because the Modern English form would then have been "lope," rhiming with "hope" (cf. "groat," from Dutch groot).

The word is neither Celtic, nor Dutch, nor French; nor is it native English. There was a M.E. lope, meaning a "leap," and a verb lopen, "to run" (see Mätzner), which are worth considering. If these were from the O.Fries. hlāpa, or formed from the pp. hlopen of A.S. hlēpan, "to leap," the Modern English form would have been "lope," as before.

The Mod. Eng. oo, if of native origin, comes from A.S. ō; but there is no A.S. lōp or hlōp. There is only one way in which any of these forms can give the Mod. Eng. oo; and here, I believe, we are at last on the trail. It can come from Norse au. Of this there are two clear instances, both pointed out by Zupitza—namely, Eng. "loose," from Icel. laus; and Eng. "stoop" (a beaker), from Icel. staup. Hence our "loop" can certainly be derived, phonetically, from Icel. laup or hlaup. But laup will not do: it means "a basket," Prov. Eng. leap, from the A.S. leap, "a basket," the cognate form. We are thus led to consider the Icel. hlaup, as being the only known source which will give, phonetically, a Modern English form "loop."

We have now to consider the sense. The Icelandic verb hlaupa means usually "to leap," but also to run; the sb. hlaup is properly "a leap," but sometimes "a running." The Norwegian laup usually means "course"; so, also, Swed. lopp, löp, Dan. løb. The reference is, not infrequently, to the course of time, or to the course of water. I believe the solution of the sense of "loop-hole" is that it refers to the course of light, as being a place where the light may leap in. This curious and unexpected sense is well illustrated by dialectal uses. Thus, Molbech explains that the dialectal Dan. løb means the bore of a cannon or the barrel of a gun, senses which belong not only to the Dutch and Low Germ. loop, but even to the Germ. Lauf. In this view, a "loop-hole" was a bore or hole through a thick wall (cf. Cotgrave's explanation of rayère above). It is singular that Langland (Piers the Plowman, C. xxi. 288) suggests this idea: "That no light lōpe in at lover ne at loupe." The sense of noose in a string is later; it easily follows from that of bore or hole in a wall. But there is a possibility that it meant "running knot" (cf. Germ. Laufdohne, Laufschlinge). Further light is desired; see the senses of "loop" in Halliwell.

AN EARLY PETRARCH.

Taylorian Institution, Oxford: May 19, 1896.

An early Italian commentary on Petrarch's Trionfi d'Amor, together with the original text, which has recently been acquired for the library of this institution, is deprived of the upper part of its title-page, which I desire to supply by means of another perfect copy accessible to some reader of the ACADEMY. The lower preserved part of the title-page reads:

"Perázone cò molte acote et eccellente additione + Miser Bernardo Lyctio sopra il Triùphi—Miser Francesco Phillepho—Antonio de Tempo—Hieronym Alexandrino sopra Soneti e Canzone."

This volume does not contain the Soneti e Canzone, but only the Trionfi, bearing the head title on each left-hand page: "Triumphus Amoris—Castitatis—Mortis—Famae—Temporis—Divinitatis."

It is a large octavo volume of 128 leaves, illustrated with six woodcuts, each of which covers a whole page. The colophon at the end reads: "Finisse il Petrarcha con tre Comenti: Milano MCCCCXXII."

H. KREBS.

P.S.—As Mr. H. Hirst has pointed out to me, the register of leaves shows clearly that the first part of this Petrarch, containing the text of the Soneti e Canzone with three commentaries—as stated on the title-page and in the colophon—must have originally preceded the Trionfi, with a separate pagination. Perhaps this first part has been preserved somewhere else.

A BURNS' LETTER.

Glasgow: May 25, 1896.

The explanation which Mr. W. E. A. Axon asks, in connexion with the "odd" circumstance that a letter written by Burns from Edinburgh and dated December 7, 1786, which appears in Chambers's Life of Burns as addressed to Gavin Hamilton in Mauchline, should have appeared in the Imperial Magazine in 1819 as addressed to a member of the Coilsfield family is quite simple.

"G. B.," who communicated the letter to the Imperial Magazine, seems to have been unaware of the fact that it had been published correctly by Cromek in 1808. The internal evidence of its having been written to Gavin Hamilton is overwhelming. The business portion of it refers to certain lands which belonged to the Loudoun family, and in which Hamilton was interested as factor for that family. "I always remember Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Kennedy in my poetic prayers" is quite intelligible as portion of a letter addressed to the husband of the one lady and the brother-in-law of the other. But the words have no meaning as addressed to Colonel Montgomerie, who was no connexion of the Mauchline Writer.

SCIENCE.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

American Journal of Mathematics. Vol. XVIII. Nos. 1 and 2. (Baltimore.) No. 1 opens with a long paper (61 pp.) by M. E. Cartan, "Sur la Réduction à sa Forme Canonique de la Structure d'un Groupe de Transformations fini et continu." This is, in a sense, an extension of some results obtained by M. Lie in the Theorie der Transformationsgruppen. The author proposes to continue his investigations in a future memoir. Mr. A. L. Baker writes upon "Algebraical Symbols" in connexion with the Calculus of Reals, Complex Functions, and Quaternions. Mr. C. H. Kummell, in a paper headed "To express the Roots of the Solvable Quantics as Symmetrical Functions of Homologues," extends results obtained in his "Symmetries of the Cubic and methods of treating the Irreducible Case" (Annals of Mathematics). Two short notes—namely, on "Singular Solutions," by Mr. J. M. Page, and on "A Point of the Theory of Functions," by Mr. A. S. Chessin—complete the number, which is accompanied by a fine portrait of M. P. Appell.

No. 2 opens with Mr. P. H. Cowell's memoir on "The Inclination Terms in the Moon's Co-ordinates." In this the author takes into account, according to Dr. G. W. Hill's method, detailed in the first volume of the American Journal, the inclination of the moon's orbit, considering it as the manifestation of a small oscillation about Dr. Hill's distorted circular orbit, which relatively to the sun is a closed curve. We have previously mentioned in the ACADEMY Prof. E. W. Brown's striking papers on the lines of Dr. Hill's work—"The orbit considered is the intermediary orbit." Mr. A. S. Chessin, writing on non-uniform convergence of Infinite Series, clears up a statement in his note (supra No. 1) which he has found liable to be misunderstood. In his remarks on a certain class of Equipotential Surfaces, Mr. B. O. Peirce discusses the nature of such systems of plane curves as are at once the right sections of possible systems of equipotential cylindrical surfaces belonging to distributions of matter which attract according to the law of Nature, and the generating curves of possible systems of equipotential surfaces of revolution. M. M. Petrovitch contributes "Remarques sur les Équations de Dynamique et sur le Mouvement Tautochrone." Mr. J. Pierpont, in a note on Mr. C. S. Peirce's paper on "A Quincuncial Projection of the Sphere" (American Journal, vol. ii., p. 394), points out what he considers to be a mistake in that "very elegant representation of the sphere" on a plane; and, in a further note, he gives a simplified proof (as compared with Netto's shortened form of "Jordan's lengthened demonstration") of the fundamental theorem "on the invariance of the factors of composition of a substitution group." The closing paper, by M. H. Maschke, on the representation of Finite Groups, especially of the rotation groups of the regular bodies of three- and four-dimensional space, by Cayley's colour diagrams, shows how readily Cayley's method ("Theory of Groups: Graphical representation," vol. i., p. 174, and "On the Theory of Groups," vol. xi., p. 139, of the American Journal) can be applied to the construction and investigation of numerous groups of higher orders. The paper is illustrated with a number of diagrams.

THE DETERMINATION OF THE LONGITUDE OF MADRAS.

Teheran: March 19, 1896.

The important work of joining the survey of India with that of Europe by correctly fixing the difference of time between the observatories of Madras and Greenwich has just been completed. It had long been known that the generally accepted longitude of Madras, as determined before this by means of time signals through the telegraph cables connecting India with Europe via the Red Sea, was considerably in error; but no attempt had been made to correct it on the maps published by the Survey of India, as it would evidently have been a mistake to do so until the true and correct value was settled once for all. Excellent work was done in 1877 by Colonels Campbell and Heaviside, of the Royal Engineers, in connecting Suez with Aden and Aden with Bombay; but unfortunately there was a weak link between Suez and Greenwich, and their observations did not fix Bombay satisfactorily.

As the difficulty of working through long submarine cables is very great, it was decided that any further attempt to fix the longitude of some place in India, between which and Madras the difference of time was correctly known, should be made on the telegraph line connecting London and India by way of Germany, Russia, and Persia. This line, which is known as the Indo-European Telegraph, and is worked by the Indo-European Telegraph Company from London to Teheran, and by the English Government from Teheran to India, has submarine cables for only short distances. In 1893 it was decided that the work should be undertaken. The purchase of an entirely new equipment was sanctioned—two transits were ordered from Messrs. Troughton & Simms, of London; two chronographs from Messrs. Warner & Swasey, of Cleveland, Ohio; and two special chronometers from Messrs. Bond, of Boston, Mass. The instruments were ready in the summer of 1894, and the work began in the autumn. The persons entrusted with the work were two very able officers of the Royal Engineers, Capt. S. G. Burrard and Lieut. G. P. Lenox Conyngham, both of whom had had considerable experience of work of this nature.

The Persian Gulf arc was first measured through the English Government cable connecting Bushire with Karachi, the latter place being one of the stations of the system of longitudes which extends over India. There were, it is true, some difficulties with the cable; but these were successfully got over, and this portion of the work was finished in February, 1895. Both officers then proceeded to England; and, while the necessary negotiations with foreign governments were proceeding, certain slight alterations in the equipment, which experience pointed out, were effected. In consultation with the Astronomer Royal and the Engineer-in-Chief of the Post Office telegraphs, it was at first decided to have Berlin and Teheran as the two intermediate stations between Greenwich and Bushire; but, later on, it was found more convenient to adopt Potsdam instead of Berlin, on account of the greater amount of available space. The German authorities rendered valuable assistance, the head of the Geodetic Institute, Prof. Helmert, giving every facility, and an experienced officer of the Telegraph Department being instructed to help. The Indo-European Telegraph Company most kindly placed one of their wires at the disposal of the officers. The connexion between Greenwich and Potsdam was completed with all possible care in August, 1895, the only serious difficulty encountered being the unfavourable weather, which caused great delay. Lieut. Conyngham then proceeded to Teheran, Capt. Burrard remaining at Potsdam, in order to measure the great arc between these two places. Not the least difficult part of the work was the transport of the delicate yet heavy instruments, which were ill adapted for mule transport, from the Caspian to Teheran; but, thanks to Lieut. Conyngham's unceasing care and attention, no accidents occurred. After putting up the instruments in the grounds of the English Legation here, an attempt was made to work direct with Potsdam without any translation between; but the attempt not being successful, a translation was inverted at Odessa. Fortunately this point had been discussed and arranged by Lieut. Conyngham on passing through Odessa, in case it should prove necessary. The measurement of this arc was extremely difficult. It was found that the induction from the great number of wires on the same poles as the Indo-European Company's wire from Warsaw to Berlin completely obliterated the rather faint signals passing from Odessa direct; and Capt. Burrard, with infinite tact, approached the German telegraph authorities, and succeeded in obtaining the immense concession of having all work on the wires stopped for a short period every night during the exchange of the time-signals. As there were in places as many as fifty wires which had to be kept quiet, it will be seen that the concession was a very important one. On account of bad weather either at Berlin or at Teheran, and a total interruption of all communication for a fortnight in November, through floods in the Caucasus, the work on the Potsdam-Teheran section continued for nearly two months, and was very arduous; but it was at last successfully brought to an end. Capt. Burrard then proceeded to Bushire, Lieut. Conyngham remaining at Teheran in order to measure the remaining link from Teheran to Bushire. This measurement has just been completed without any serious difficulty. The whole operation of connecting Karachi with Greenwich has taken about eighteen months, and the final result will in due time be published by the Survey of India. The success of the work has been due not only to the unflagging zeal of the two officers, but also to the admirable state of efficiency in which the lines of the Indo-European Telegraph are maintained. The new instruments have given every satisfaction, their workmanship being most excellent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK.

Liverpool: May 16, 1896.

This morning's ACADEMY contains the second half of Prof. Conway's reply to my criticisms. His two letters differ widely in tone and value. If I merely desired a polemic victory, I should prefer the first; but, seeing that I desire chiefly to get the subject further elucidated, whether by my opponents or by myself, I much prefer the second. The two letters demand such different replies that I think it will be best to answer them separately. Prof. Conway opens his first letter by declaring that he is being misunderstood, while, in point of fact, he is strenuously engaged in misunderstanding me. I will take up this letter of his (ACADEMY, May 9) point by point, and show that it is absolutely made up of avoidable misunderstandings.

(1) He alleges that I did not observe his strong expressions of attachment to the tutorial point of view. But I did observe them very closely. My complaint is that up till now this attachment, however strongly expressed, has been purely Platonic: it has led to nothing, it has begotten nothing. Prof. Conway has aimed from first to last at a hard and fast fifth-century standard; and even where a choice of alternatives existed, tutorial considerations have counted for little or nothing in his actual choice. Now mark the natural result. Last year the Professors decreed, ex cathedra, without alternative, that  $\phi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\theta$  were to be pronounced ( $p+h$ ), ( $k+h$ ), and ( $t+h$ ); but now, in this letter, Prof. Conway is "anxious to obtain opinions whether these are teachable values" or not. Last year the Professors decreed that  $\epsilon$  and  $\circ$  were no longer to be made identical with English (and Welsh)  $e$  and  $o$ , but were to have "close" values, though it was as evident then as it is now that these values were and are unteachable in this country; and so in other cases. Besides, if the Professors had not some lurking dislike to this point of view, I do not yet see why they repeatedly pilloried my innocent good word "tutorial" between inverted commas.

(2) The Professor next proceeds to allege that, except as to  $\phi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\theta$ , the divergence between himself and me "is, nevertheless, when seen from the standpoint of the practical teacher, confined within very narrow limits"; and he repeats this in his second letter. But the Professors recommend that  $\zeta$  shall be pronounced  $dz$ ; I recommend that it be pronounced  $dz$ . The Professors want  $\omega$  pronounced like English "awe"; I want it kept equivalent to Latin  $\bar{o}$ , as at present. The Professors want  $\epsilon$  pronounced as a monophthong = French  $\acute{e}$ ; I want it pronounced as a diphthong ( $\acute{e}+i$ ). If there really is a "practical teacher" who considers these differences "very narrow," I would much like to know him, for he must be a very extraordinary man.

(3) The next paragraph of the Professor's letter contains what is perhaps the most remarkable of this very remarkable series of misunderstandings. "It may be taken, then, that the questions Dr. Lloyd wishes us to discuss refer to the age of Pericles." I need only trouble the impartial reader to refer to the letter in which I opened this discussion (ACADEMY, January 11), and especially to the series of sentences of which the first runs thus: "I desire to enter a caveat against the hard and fast adoption of the fifth century B.C. as the standard period of Greek pronunciation."

(4) In the next two paragraphs I am first gently chidden for referring to Brugmann's Grundriss, instead of referring to his "more recent" Griechische Grammatik, second edition. As a matter of fact, the Grammatik came out between the volumes of the Grundriss, and I knew very well that it contained nothing to invalidate my quotations from the latter. I therefore watched with some interest to see what the Professor would do. He is actually reduced to quote a passage which says nothing about date at all! It is simply a common-sense direction about the interpretation of local inscriptions which happen to contain  $\phi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\theta$ , or their equivalents. What Brugmann does say about date in the Grammatik is precisely equivalent to what I quoted from the Grundriss. I was, therefore, absolutely right in stating that Brugmann does not support the Professors on the aspirate question. Brugmann knows too well the conflict of evidence; and he knows also that two warring pronunciations often exist side by side for long spaces of time without the decisive victory of either—a possibility which never seems to have entered for one moment into Prof. Conway's calculations. Hence his readiness to rush in with a positive verdict where Brugmann fears to tread. Let it be here noted that for my part I am not concerned to maintain that the spirant pronunciations ( $\zeta$ , German  $ch$ , and English  $th$  in "thin") were the dominant values of  $\phi$ ,  $\chi$ ,  $\theta$  in Athens in the fifth or even in the fourth century B.C. It is enough for the purposes of my argument if they are classical at all. That the  $\Sigma\omega\phi\iota\kappa\iota\sigma$  spelling proves little may be seen from Meisterhans, 2nd edit., p. 60.

(5) The Professor's next two paragraphs treat of Dr. Dawes' thesis. The Professor, as usual, misunderstands. My main point, as anybody can see (ACADEMY, March 21), is not that Dr. Dawes, but that the examiners of London University, who approved her thesis, saw nothing unreasonable in holding the aspirated values doubtful. But the Professor simply falls foul of Dr. Dawes, and resumes the attack which he made on her thesis in the Classical Review for February. Now it is all very well to scoff at Dr. Dawes. But what if she were to reciprocate? Let us see what might then happen.

(6) The next part of Prof. Conway's reply to me consists of two paragraphs from this very review. The first of the two quoted paragraphs is relevant and reasonable. I would only suggest that the crucial thing to be noted in the mass of vulgar spellings such as  $\chi\theta\omega$  and  $\omega\theta\omega$  for  $\chi\tau\omega$ , is not simply that they continue into the fourth century B.C., but that they practically cease in the third. Did the aspirate suddenly cease to be detachable in 300 B.C.? Certainly not. The spirant pronunciation must have been growing in the fourth century, otherwise it could not have become decisively victorious in the third. This is how I read the evidence exhibited by Meisterhans (Gram. der Attischen Inschriften, p. 79).

But the other paragraph professes to give

"fresh evidence of a most conclusive character from the transcription of a very large number of Demotic words into Greek letters in the two Gnostic papyri of London and Leyden," as set forth by Hess (Indogerm. Forschungen, vi., p. 223). Hess dates them in the second century A.D. But a house divided against a house falleth; and if Prof. Conway be divided against Prof. Conway, how shall his criticism stand? We turn over the leaf of the Classical Review and we find on the previous page Prof. Conway's definition—not at all a bad one—of a Phonetic Law. It is "a definite uniform change of a given sound, under definite conditions, completed within definite limits of time and place."

Prof. Conway has enunciated this so often that he calls it "grievous to repeat." He intends it, of course, for Dr. Dawes. But what is sauce for Dr. Dawes is sauce also for Prof. Conway. Let us inquire, then, under what Phonetic Law this "most conclusive evidence" of his can be considered to have any weight. In point of time, it is seven centuries removed from Pericles; in point of place, it is removed to a foreign and distant country; in point of conditions, it belongs to a dialect which, I must again point out, is not phonetically descended from the Attic. Does Prof. Conway, for a moment, suppose that Egyptians would or could acquire Greek, except with a strongly Egyptianised phonology? Nothing is more likely than that the Greek aspirates, reaching Egypt alive, would flourish and survive exceptionally amid an aspirating population. And as to the kind of Greek pronunciation which the Egyptians originally adopted, it may be usefully pointed out that the Alexandrian New Testament MSS. of the fourth century A.D. contain the spellings ἁρτία, ἁρίαν, χειλίαν, τέρατα, κίρατα, τάχιον, and many others, representing pronunciations which cannot possibly have come from Attica, because they had been obsolete in Attica for nearly a thousand years. Besides, we know historically that Greek pronunciation did not reach Egypt through specially Attic channels. The influence of Attica on Hellenic phonology must not be measured by its influence on vocabulary, through literature. It is thus seen that Prof. Conway fails to comprehend his own definition. Not content with misunderstanding me, he misunderstands himself also. Surely this ought to be the climax of misunderstanding.

(7) But the next paragraph contains yet another. Prof. Conway wonders that I demur to his neglecting Blass' opinions about  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ . It is true that I demur; but this is not what I demur to. If the kind reader will refer to my previous letters, he will easily discover that my points about  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$  are these: (a) The Professors assert that there is a practical unanimity of good authorities about Greek pronunciation in the fifth century B.C.; (b) they nominate as best authorities Brugmann, G. Meyer, and Blass; but (c) on consulting these authorities the alleged agreement is not found to exist; they are found, among other things, to differ widely on the simple case of  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ ,  $\delta$ ; therefore, the question is certainly not yet in that ripe condition which the Professors allege. Prof. Conway now says that he indicated on p. iv. of his pamphlet "the far higher degree of authority" which he attributed to Brugmann and G. Meyer, as compared with Blass. But on turning to the page cited, I find no indication of such a preference whatever. Brugmann himself quotes Blass continually; and if there is an admitted difference of authority, what becomes of the alleged unanimity?

(8) There are three footnotes to this first letter of Prof. Conway's, and there is just one of them which is capable of containing a misunderstanding. It contains it. Prof. Conway dislikes my explanation of the Fundanius incident; therefore he chooses from the variae lectiones of that story one which conveys the implication that a Greek of Cicero's time could make no better shot at the pronunciation of the Latin name Fundanius than Hundanius; and then he seems to think that he has demolished my theory, which is (a) that this Greek used his native  $\phi$  for the Latin F, and (b) that his native  $\phi$  was bilabial f ("blowing  $\phi$  cool"). But the attentive reader will remember that my valuation of Quintilian's  $\phi$  was not based on one but on three passages from his writings. It is useless to submit these again to Prof. Conway; but every point securely fixed in these matters helps to fix more. I will therefore take an early opportunity of submitting the question in its phonetic aspect to my colleagues of the Association Phonétique, and will invite opinions.

(9) I have now analysed the whole of Prof. Conway's first letter, except two paragraphs about vowels, which belong more to the subject of his second. On the other hand, there is a paragraph about  $\zeta$  in his second letter, which I will deal with here, thus finishing the consonants altogether. It also makes a good finish to my letter, because it consists of no less than five misunderstandings, all very fine and large. First, "Dr. Lloyd does not demur to  $zd$  as having been the actual fifth-century value of  $\zeta$ "; if the reader will turn to the conclusion of my examination of  $\zeta$  (ACADEMY, March 28) he will read, "There is really no evidence that  $zd$  was ever the prevailing value of  $\zeta$  in Attica." Second, "The value of  $\zeta$  in prosody is at once explained and impressed on the schoolboy's memory"; but it is obvious that  $dz$  does this just as well as, or rather better, than  $zd$ , as I showed in my said letter. Third, " $zd$  is a very common childish mispronunciation of both English j and French j, both initially and medially"; but if  $zd$  in this case is common (which I doubt),  $dz$  is certainly much commoner; one may hear pronunciations like dzam for "jam," pidzon for "pigeon," dzamé for jamais any day, but I think the child who says dzam, pidzon, or dzamé may be bracketed with the "Practical Teacher" whom we heard of just now, as avis rarissima. Fourth, "The combination of sounds"  $zd$  "is extremely common in English"; it is fairly common in that position where it never occurs in Greek—namely, as final (in "closed," "raised," &c.); but very rare indeed as a medial, and absolutely wanting as an initial form. Fifth, says Prof. Conway, the  $zd$  pronunciation will teach the student the true Aryan etymology of ἔσς = Ger. ast, and of ἔσ (surely he means ἔω) = Lat. -sido; but I have shown conclusively in the same letter that the equation  $\zeta = \text{Idg. } zd$ , will lead the student ten times as often wrong as right, while  $dz$  points very straightly to the ordinary Idg. equivalents of  $\zeta$ , namely, dy and gy.

I have now said about the consonants what it is absolutely necessary to say. It would be unkind to say more.

THE SHIRBURN CASTLE BASQUE MSS.

Jesus College, Oxford: May 25, 1896.

In your Philology Notes last week a paragraph appears which states two facts quite correctly, but from an unfortunate collocation of words conveys a false impression. It is quite true that Mr. Wentworth Webster has published in two foreign periodicals specimens (with which I supplied him) of d'Urte's (1) Basque Grammar and (2) Dictionary. These specimens are intended to enable Basque scholars to judge of the value of those works with a view to their publication. The expense and difficulty of issuing such lengthy treatises will be so great that the most sanguine Basconophile cannot look forward to their early appearance.

It is not, however, true (as might be inferred from the paragraph) that Mr. Wentworth Webster has issued a new edition of d'Urte's translation of Genesis with part of Exodus.

The only edition yet published is the one which I was kindly allowed to bring out in "Anecdota Oxoniensia" in 1893; and of this edition more than three hundred copies remain, and are likely long to remain, in the store-rooms of the Clarendon Press. The price is prohibitive and the work is not adapted for popular use. But it is very desirable that a popular edition of the version should be published and circulated in the province of Labourde. A famous Basque scholar in France is ready to superintend the work, and to make such alteration of obsolete words and evident mistakes as absolutely necessary. Compared with the issue of the above-mentioned treatises, the expense of bringing out this interesting fragment would be trifling.

Is there no individual or society ready to undertake this expense, and to make a present to the Labourdin Basques of a translation of the Bible prepared for them two hundred years ago?

LLEWELYN THOMAS.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE Epidemiological Society has resolved to found a medal in honour of Jenner, to be awarded to persons who shall have added to the knowledge of epidemiology and preventive medicine.

THE Croonian Lectures will be delivered at the Royal College of Physicians, by Dr. George Oliver, on Tuesday and Thursday of next week and the following week, his subject being "The Study of the Blood and the Circulation."

THE annual general meeting of the Institution of Civil Engineers—to receive the report of the council, and to elect the officers for next year—will be held on Tuesday next, at Great George-street Westminster.

THE evening discourse at the Royal Institution, on Friday next, will be delivered by Prof. J. A. Fleming, on "Electrical and Magnetic Research at Low Temperatures."

AT the meeting of the Zoological Society, to be held on Tuesday next, Mr. Charles Davies Sherborn will give an explanation of the plan adopted by him in preparing his Index Generum et Specierum Animalium.

ON Friday next, at 4 p.m., Dr. D. Morris, of Kew, will deliver the first of two lectures in the Gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's Park, on "The Plants and Gardens of the Canary Islands," illustrated with lantern slides. The lectures are free to visitors to the gardens.

AT the meeting of the Geologists' Association, to be held on Friday next at University College, Prof. John Milne, of Japan, will read a paper, illustrated by the lantern, on "Geodynamics," dealing with bradyseisms, earthquakes, and other movements of the earth's crust.

MAJOR P. A. MACMAHON has been appointed to represent the London Mathematical Society at the celebration of Lord Kelvin's jubilee at Glasgow.

THE metropolitan counties branch of the British Medical Association will give a conversazione in the Natural History Museum, Cromwell-road, on Thursday, June 18.

AT the last meeting of the Zoological Society for scientific business, the secretary (Mr. P. L. Solater) exhibited a daguerreotype portrait of what was believed to be the first gorilla ever brought alive to Europe. It was living in Wombwell's menagerie in 1855, and was then erroneously supposed to be a chimpanzee. This portrait has been lent by a man formerly in Mr. Wombwell's employ, who had sent with it an account of the animal and its habits.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. have just published an English translation, by Mr. D. E. Jones and Mr. G. A. Schott, of a volume of miscellaneous papers by Heinrich Hertz, the young German physicist, whose remarkable researches in electricity were unhappily cut short by his premature death. This volume contains mainly his earlier investigations, which have hitherto been difficult of access. The introduction, by Prof. Lenard, includes extracts from Hertz's letters to his parents, which throw interesting light upon the course of his scientific development.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At the meeting of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, to be held in Great Russell-street on Tuesday next, the Rev. G. Margoliouth, of the British Museum, will read a paper on "Some Fragments of the Palestinian Version of the Holy Scriptures."

At the meeting of the Philological Society, to be held on Friday next at University College, Gower-street, Prof. Skeat will read two papers on "The Text of Wyclif's Bible," and "Chaucer Miscellanies."

A PRELIMINARY announcement has been issued of the eleventh Oriental Congress, which, in accordance with a resolution passed at the Geneva meeting two years ago, is to be held at Paris in 1897. The date now fixed is from September 5 to 12; the subscription is twenty francs; and M. Ernest Leroux has been appointed treasurer and publisher. The permanent committee is composed as follows: president, M. Charles Schefer, administrator of the Ecole des Langues Orientales Vivantes; vice-president, Prof. Barbier de Meynard, president of the Société Asiatique; secretaries, Prof. Maspero and Prof. Henri Cordier. The number of sections has been enlarged to seven, three of which are sub-divided; and archaeology is added to language in the title of each. Aryan, the first section, is sub-divided into India, Iran, and Linguistics; the Far East, into (a) China and Japan, and (b) Indo-China, Malaysia, and Polynesia; Mohammedan languages and archaeology have a section to themselves; Semitic is sub-divided into (a) Aramaean, Hebrew, Phœnician, and Ethiopic, and (b) Assyrian; the languages of Africa are combined with Egyptian; a special section is devoted to the relations between Greece and the East down to the Byzantine period; and what we believe to be a new section has for its subject the ethnography and folk-lore of the East. The wealth of France in oriental scholarship is shown by the committees for each section, whose names it is unnecessary to quote, as most of them would be familiar to readers of the ACADEMY.

We quote the following from an Indian newspaper:

"Mr. L. Rice, director of the Archaeological Department in Mysore, who two years ago discovered the Asoka edicts of Siddapur, has again made three most valuable finds. The best preserved among the three documents is a long metrical eulogy on the excavation of a tank, near a Siva temple; and the other two are, in spite of their defective preservation, of very considerable interest. They are found on one and the same stone pillar, and show nearly the same characters. The older one contains an edict in Prakrit of the Pali type, by which the Maharaja Haritiputta Satakanni, the joy of the Vinukabaddu family, assigns certain villages to a Brahman. This Satakanni is already known through a short native inscription found by Dr. Burgess at Banavasi, which records the gift of the image of a Naga, a tank, and a Buddhist Vihara by the Maharaja's daughter. The other document, which contains an invocation of a deity, called Mattapattidēva, probably a local form of Siva, furnishes further proof for the early prevalence of Brahmanism in Mysore."

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CAMBRIDGE PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.—(Monday, April 27.)

PROF. J. J. THOMSON, president, in the chair.—The following communications were made: On "Photographing the Whole Length of a Spectrum at once," by Prof. Liveing, who exhibited photographs of a variety of spectra, in which the whole length of the spectrum between the wave-lengths 550 and 214 was depicted on a celluloid film at one operation. A concave grating of 10½ feet radius was used, with the slit in the centre of curvature, and the slide which held the sensitive film formed part of a cylinder with a radius of 5½ feet, so that when the axis of this cylinder was midway between the slit and grating every part of the spectrum was perfectly focussed on the film. The length of the photograph between the limits of wave-length above mentioned was 65 centimeters. To obviate the confusion caused by the overlapping of the spectra of different orders, he projected on to the slit the image of the source of light by means of a combination of two quartz lenses with a quartz prism of 30 deg. between them. The slit being vertical the edge of the prism was made horizontal, with the result that the more refrangible rays were somewhat diverted downwards, and the image of the slit produced by them fell on the film at a different level from that produced by less refrangible rays. Consequently the spectrum of the second order in the photograph was about half the length of the lines lower than the part of the spectrum of the first order at the same place, and the two orders were at once distinguished. It is not at all difficult with a table of sines to set out a scale of wave-lengths for a spectrum formed in this way; and such a scale once made would of course apply to all photographs taken with the same instrument, provided there were no inequalities in the shrinking of the films when drying after development. Unfortunately Prof. Liveing had found that the films, inelastic as they seem even when wet, did not shrink uniformly, and he was therefore turning his attention to glass plates. Glass plates will not bend to cylinders of so short a radius as 5½ feet without danger of fracture, but thin sheet glass can easily be bent to a cylinder of double that radius. He was therefore fitting up a suitable camera for use with a large grating of 21 feet radius, and hoped to obtain photographs with it which should not only be useful for reference, but from which wave-lengths could be read off to a close approximation. At present he could only read off wave-lengths from the films by photographing a known spectrum, such as that of iron, at the same time and on the same film as the other spectrum, and measuring the distance of the unknown line from the nearest lines of known wave-length, a much more troublesome process than the simple application of the scale.—"The Atomic Weight of Oxygen," by Mr. A. Scott, who gave a short account of the present state of our knowledge as to the atomic weight of oxygen, and said that it might be regarded as conclusively proved that if  $H = 1$ ,  $O = 15.87$  to  $15.88$ . Morley determined the densities of hydrogen and of oxygen, and the ratios by volume in which the gases combine (by a somewhat indirect method), and finally combined known weights of hydrogen and weighed the water produced. Thomson made similar determinations but with far less pretension to the highest accuracy attainable. The results were:—

	Morley.	Thomson.
Weight of a litre of oxygen at 0°C. and 760 mm. at sea level,	1.42900	1.42906
ditto for hydrogen	.089973	.089947
Ratio of densities	15.9003	15.8975
Ratio of combining volumes	1 : 2.00369	1 : 2.00287
Atomic weight of oxygen	15.879	15.869

The ratios by volume in which the gases combine agree well with that published by the author directly three years ago—viz., 1 : 2.00245 at about 15° and 1 : 2.00285 at 0°C.—"The Active Principles of Indian Hemp," by Messrs. Wood and Easterfield. The authors have examined a sample of charas, the exuded resin of Indian hemp, with a view to isolating the physiologically active constituent. They find that charas consists of (i) insoluble matter (38 per cent.), (ii) a terpene B.P. 170°—175° O. (1.5 per cent.), (iii) a sesquiterpene B.P. 258°—259° O. (2 per cent.), (iv) a paraffin, probably  $C_{25}H_{50}$  (5 per cent.), and (v) a compound  $C_{11}H_{12}O_2$ , B.P. 265°—270° O. at 15 mm. pressure (31 per cent.); to the last of these they attribute the physiological action of the hemp plant. This active compound, which the authors name cannabinol, is a red semi-solid substance at ordinary temperatures, but is quite liquid at 60° O.; it yields a monoacetyl and monobenzoyl derivative, and can be nitrated. The same compound has been isolated by the authors from the usual medicinal preparations of Cannabis Indica.—

"The Pharmacological Action of Hemp Resin," by Mr. Marshall. The pharmacologically active compound of charas is the compound, cannabinol. In doses of 0.1 g. to 0.15 g. it produces decided intoxication, characterised by fits of uncontrollable laughter, slurring speech, and ataxic gait, a complete loss of time-relation and a sense of extreme happiness; sensation is diminished somewhat and the pulse-rate rises; as a rule there are no hallucinations. The acute symptoms last about three hours. Smaller doses (0.05 g.) produce similar effects, but to less marked degree. Animals appear to be less susceptible to its influence than man, and herbivorous animals than carnivorous. The terpenes appear to act as such, and they do not possess the peculiar effects of the crude drug. The other bodies are inactive.

(Monday, May 11.)

PROF. J. J. THOMSON, president, in the chair.—Mr. F. O. Shrubbs read a paper on "Orania from Tenerife," embodying the measurements of sixty-one skulls and 200 long bones. The average height of the islanders, calculated from the latter, was for males 1642 mm. and for females 1552 mm. The population were divided into four types. The first and most numerous are characterised by a skull of large capacity, mesocephalic, mesocephalic and leptorhine, with a sharply-cut nose sunken at the root, an elliptical palate, rounded forehead, full occipital region and complicated sutures; blond complexion and height above the average. This type was that of the ancient Guanches. The second race was also tall and fair, although darker than the former, with skulls which were dolichocephalic, mesocephalic, leptorhine, and with a parabolic palate, retreating forehead, simple sutures, and no marked fulness of the occiput. The third type were dark and of medium height, with ovoid skulls of small capacity, dolichocephalic and hypsistenocephalic, a slightly prognathous face, and a prominent nose not sunken at the root. This race is probably Semitic. The fourth type were short and dark, with brachycephalic, megaseme, and platyrhine skulls of fair capacity.

ROYAL ASIATIC.—(Anniversary Meeting, Tuesday, May 12.)

LORD REAY, president, in the chair.—Lord Loch, in moving the re-election of Lord Reay as president for the next three years, pointed out that through his influence in India Lord Reay was able to save an Archaeological Commission there. He had also well represented the society at the Geneva Congress. Dr. R. N. Cust seconded the motion, which was carried.—Lord Reay, in accepting the presidency, said he hoped that during his term of office he should see the establishment in London of an Oriental School, the lack of which was a disgrace to England.—The secretary, Prof. Rhys-Davids, read the report, which showed the election of forty-six new members, against the loss of thirteen. The receipts from sales of the Journal had been larger than ever before, and the society had during the year added £300 to its capital.—Dr. Thornton, in moving the adoption of the report, congratulated the society, that, in spite of the death of so many distinguished men, including Sir Henry Rawlinson, Sir Thomas Wade, Dr. Roast, and Prof. von Roth, the prospects of the continuation of its work were assured by the very encouraging presence of so many young and promising workers in all branches of oriental research. The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. Kennedy. Among the others who took part in the discussion were Major-General G. G. Alexander, Dr. Gæster, Dr. Leitner, Mr. Desai, Mr. Raynbird, Prof. Bendall, and Mr. Henry Morris.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, May 20.)

E. MAWNEY, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. R. H. Curtis read a paper on "The Exposure of Anemometers," in which he gave the results of a comparison of the records from the three anemometers at Holyhead: namely, the Robinson, the bridled, and the pressure-tube anemometers. It was clearly shown that the force of the wind is greatly affected by surrounding objects. The author is of opinion that for anemometrical records to be reliable and of value, not only must the instrument be exposed in an open place, free from local obstructions, but it is also absolutely essential that the stand which carries it shall offer practically no resistance to the wind, and that the instrument should not be placed on the roof of a house. The paper was illustrated by a number of lantern slides.—An interesting collection of photographs of clouds, sent to the society by Mr. H. O. Russell, of the Sydney Observatory, was also exhibited.

HISTORICAL.—(Thursday, May 21.)

SIR M. E. GRANT DUFF, president, in the chair.—A paper was read by Mr. Arthur Hughes on "The Parliament of Lincoln, 1316," in which the events which led to the passing of the Statute of Sheriffs were explained and illustrated by the author's original researches among the Exchequer and Chancery Records.

FINE ART.

THE NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY.

THE most recent acquisitions to the National Portrait Gallery have been:

By gift: Thomas Graham, Lord Lynedoch, an oil painting by Sir George Hayter, R.A., presented by the Earl of Bradford; Baron Carlo Marochetti, R.A., a bronze statuette by Signor Ambrosio, of Turin, presented by Signora Muratori; Dr. Dionysius Lardner, a miniature painting by Miss Fortunée de Lisle, presented by his son, Commissary-General George D. Lardner; David Livingstone, an oil-painting by Frederick Havill, presented by John Lillie, Esq.; and Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, painted as a child by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and presented by Lord Ronald Gower, a trustee of the Gallery.

By bequest: The Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice, an oil-painting by Samuel Laurence, bequeathed by Mrs. F. D. Maurice; the Rev. John Keble and Samuel Rogers, two fine drawings by George Richmond, R.A., bequeathed by the artist.

By purchase: Colley Gibber, a plaster bust, painted like life, and probably modelled by L. F. Roubiliac—this bust was formerly in the Strawberry-hill collection, it having been presented to Horace Walpole by Mr. Raftor, brother of Mrs. Clive, the actress, to whom it had been given by Gibber himself; Felicia Dorothea Hemans, a plaster bust modelled by Angus Fletcher; George Gordon, Lord Byron, an oil-painting by Richard Westall, R.A., exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1825 and at the National Portrait Exhibition in 1868; Archbishop Tobie Matthew, an old panel portrait, dated 1619, artist unknown.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: drawings of society, &c., by Mr. Charles Dana Gibson; and a panel exhibition of water-colours, by Messrs. Boughton, Wimperis, Orrock, and others—both at the Fine Art Society's; a small collection of pictures in oil by deceased masters of English and foreign schools—including a masterpiece by Jakob van Ruijsdael—at the Dowdeswell Galleries; and Messrs. Cassell & Co.'s fourteenth black and white exhibition, at the Cutlers' Hall.

At the Royal Institution, on Wednesday next, Prof. W. B. Richmond will deliver his concluding lecture on "The Vault of the Sixtine Chapel," which he was unable to give on May 2, owing to indisposition.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will publish shortly Studies in the Art Anatomy of Animals, being a brief analysis of the more familiar mammals and birds, designed for the use of sculptors, painters, illustrators, naturalists, and taxidermists, by Mr. Ernest E. Thompson.

THE Antiquary for June will contain illustrated articles on "The Excavation of a Mound with a Pointed Chamber in British Honduras," by Mr. T. W. F. Gann; and on "Chichester Cathedral and the Fall of the Spire in 1861," with photographs taken immediately before and after the disaster.

THE choice collection of sketches and studies by the old masters formed by the late Earl of Warwick, which was sold during two days of last week at Christie's, realised altogether a total sum of £8061. The following were some of the largest prices: a black chalk study of "The Descent from the Cross," by Michelangelo, £1400 (Colnaghi); a head in black and white chalks, by Leonardo da Vinci, £480 (Dr. Richter); various studies on one sheet, in sepia heightened with white, by Raffaele, £355 (C. Davis); a portrait of Lucas van Leyden, by Albert Dürer, £430; a profile portrait of a man, by the same, £410; a bust of a man with a flat cap, in black and white, on red-stained paper, by the same £245 (C. Davis); a "Presentation of the Virgin in the Temple," in red chalk, by Giovanni Bellini, £275; a study for a fountain, in pen and ink washed with bistre, by Andrea Mantegna, £165; a portrait of a man, in pen and ink, by Rembrandt, £150 (Colnaghi); a "Coronation of the Virgin," by Ghirlandajo, £118 (Colnaghi); a pilgrim, in black and red, by Watteau, £115 (Colnaghi).

THE golden tiara of Saitaphernes from Olbia, mentioned in the ACADEMY of last week, is no less interesting for its ornamentation than for its historical inscription. It is in the form of a sugar-loaf, divided into seven zones. One of these contains a series of bas-reliefs, representing two incidents in the history of Achilles, who is known to have been honoured at Olbia as the protector of the Pontic. These incidents are the Wrath of Achilles and the Pyre of Patroclus, with elaborate details from the Iliad. In a zone above are various scenes of Scythian life: a man breaking in a wild horse, a leopard fighting with a lion, a running bull, sheep and goats, a flying heron, &c. The top of the tiara is formed by the head of a serpent, coiled round itself. In another tomb close by was found at the same time a beautiful necklace of gold and coloured glass. Both of these are now on view in the Louvre, near the silver treasure from Bosco Reale.

THE STAGE.

WE are glad that Mr. Beerbohm Tree's experiment with "King Henry the Fourth"—a piece which he cast as strongly as may be—has been at least enough of a success to justify its inclusion in the evening bill. Mr. Tree will for the present play the piece three nights a week, instead of simply at matinées. We gather that the always somewhat inexplicable attractions of "Trilby" are on the wane.

INTEREST attaches to the re-appearance in London of Miss Olga Nethersole, which is fixed for to-night. She appears in the dramatic version of "Carmen"—disassociated, that is to say, from the fascinating music of Bizet, and relying for its attractiveness upon the pure interest of the story and the unquestioned skill of Miss Nethersole, the story's principal interpreter.

ANY attacks that have been made upon "The Sign of the Cross" seem—in so far as they have had any effect at all—to have strengthened rather than diminished its popularity. With admirable steadiness Mr. Wilson Barrett maintains his eight performances a week; and the piece "goes," as the theatrical phrase is, with a smoothness that is not to be confused with monotony or want of spirit.

Very often the extremely long run of a piece has—if our observation of the theatre be accurate—one of two results: it tends either to dulness or else to exaggeration. We could give instances of both. At the Lyric nothing of this sort is noticeable. There have, of course, been from time to time certain changes in the cast. Berenice, for example, has had several representatives; and, in regard to the near future, it is worth mentioning that, before June is over, Miss Maud Jeffries will resign for a while the part of the heroine, to which she has for many months done perfect justice, and to which she will return.

A SHORT series of performances of Robertson's "Caste" has now just concluded at a place of public entertainment in the West End; and, if we chronicle the fact to-day, it is chiefly that the appearance of Miss Maud Wellman as Polly Eccles may in fairness be noted. This young lady is an artist of distinct promise—more than that, of distinct achievement. Miss Maud Wellman's gifts in comedy will assuredly cause her to be again heard of.

MUSIC.

OBITUARY.

CLARA SCHUMANN.

As a rule, the lives of great pianists are not of special interest. Hummel, Moscheles, Thalberg, were fine executants, and won fame and gold; but who troubles himself about the kind of life they led? Of these pianists, and of many others of great merit, no biography ever has been, or is likely to be, written. What is it that makes the life of Franz Liszt so attractive? Not the account of his triumphant progress through Europe as pianist, nor the many tales of his wonderful feats on the keyboard: his fame rests on no such fleeting foundation. The sympathetic appreciation of Wagner's genius; the interest which he took in all that was new and progressive in his art; and the kindly counsel and help which he gave to rising artists—such are the features which make the story of his life worth reading. To these we may add yet another—the number of eminent men and women in every branch of literature and art with whom he came in contact.

And so with Clara Schumann, there are facts in her life, other than those connected with her public career as a pianist, which raise her above the ordinary level. She was on friendly terms with Mendelssohn, Chopin, Berlioz, and many other distinguished men; and as the wife of Robert Schumann she not only admired his genius, but strove through the years of widowhood, and through the many years of widowhood, to make his works known and appreciated.

Clara Wieck was trained by her father, one of the most renowned teachers of his day, and at the age of nine made her first public appearance; this was on October 20, 1828, the year in which Schubert died. At the commencement of her career we find her playing Kalkbrenner, Herz, Pixis—names now almost forgotten—and some of Liszt's show pieces; but classical music was not neglected, and Beethoven's Sonatas and Concertos soon formed part of her répertoire. Her father was one of the first to recognise the genius of Chopin, and little Clara soon learnt to play his compositions. Robert Schumann wrote his brilliant article on Chopin's "Don Juan" Variations (Op. 2) in the year 1834; but already, two years previously, Wieck had published, in the Cécilia, an enthusiastic article on the same work. Chopin at that time was an enigma. Rellstab, the famous critic, heard Clara play some Chopin pieces in 1834, and this is what he wrote in the Vossische Zeitung: "Clara has certainly great talent, but it is a pity that she is in the hands of a father who allows her to play such nonsense as Chopin."

For many years before her marriage with Schumann, Clara was acquainted with, and attracted by, his music; but afterwards she took still greater interest in it, and, as might be expected, became its best exponent.

In the same year in which her husband died (1856), Mme. Schumann paid her first visit to England, and received a most cordial welcome. From the very beginning—at her first recital, in June, 1856, she played the greater part of the "Carneval"—she introduced Schumann's music into her programmes, yet in no ostentatious manner: she never even gave a "Schumann" recital, although in later years an announcement to that effect would have filled St. James's Hall. Mme. Schumann had to contend for many years against two difficulties; time and patience, however, enabled her to triumph over both. Critics, blinded by prejudice, spoke slightingly of her husband's music; and in one influential quarter, and for obvious reasons, her great merits as a pianist were not properly recognised. Wagner used both tongue and pen against his enemies, and, moreover, he had from the first a few sturdy champions to defend his cause; against an indifferent public and a cold, even hostile press, the only arms which Mme. Schumann used were a tender heart, a thinking head, and skilful fingers. Her calm, patient, modest attitude no doubt hastened to some extent the hour of victory.

As a pianist, Mme. Schumann ranks among the greatest of her day. From a notice of her playing, written by Robert Schumann seven years before their marriage, also from early concert-programmes, we know that she was not above astonishing the groundlings. Those who are exceptionally gifted in the matter of technique must indulge in it to some extent: only when virtuosity gains the upper hand, when it becomes an end rather than a means, does it deserve condemnation. Robert Schumann, both before and after his marriage, no doubt influenced Clara in the right direction. She always played with care, intelligence, and feeling; and yet she was not, like Rubinstein, an all-round player. She had her special musical idols—Beethoven and Schumann; and when interpreting the music of either of these her whole heart and soul were engaged. She did not always reveal the full depth and grandeur of the ear's master, but what may have been lacking was in large measure atoned for by her artistic taste and marked earnestness: she brought one as near to the composer as lay in her power. As an exponent of Schumann, his wife and widow was facile princeps. Her love for the man no doubt increased her admiration and sympathy for his music; but the latter feeling was thoroughly genuine. In a letter of hers, written in 1851, but not published, she writes about a concert devoted to her husband's music. She gives the whole programme, which included the E flat Symphony and the pianoforte Concerto in A minor "played by myself," and adds: "All these are MSS. of my Robert, and what treasures of poetry they contain! Don't laugh at me for saying that myself, for there is really no one in the world who feels it more deeply than I." Genuine admiration for Schumann's genius, and a strong desire to carry out his intentions, give to Clara a place in musical literature to which there is really no parallel. Spohr's second wife was an excellent performer on the harp and pianoforte, and played duets with him in public; Mendelssohn's sister Fanny took pride and interest in his music, and, like Clara, was herself a composer; but in neither case was the union so strong and so spiritual as that between Clara and Robert Schumann.

Mme. Schumann, as we have just said, was a composer, and her works tell a plain, unvarnished tale. Her Fugues show order and skill, and, further, the strong influence of Bach; her Scherzos, Romances, and Variations are carefully written, and display charm and refinement; but ever and anon comes a chord or phrase which reminds us that her husband's compositions formed the world in which she chiefly lived and moved. Her music is interesting, but in no sense great. There was, however, no attempt to force her compositions on the public—in this country, at any rate, Mme. Schumann rarely played anything of her own: thus they deserve kindly recognition rather than formal criticism.

It is sincerely to be hoped that Mme. Schumann has left memoirs of some kind. The opportunity which she enjoyed of seeing master-works sketched, elaborated, and perfected, was unique. No one can explain the mystery of genius; but she could have unfolded many interesting details bearing upon the inner life of one of Germany's greatest composers.

EN ROUTE.

By J.K. HUYSMANS.

Translated from the French, with a Prefatory Note by C. KEGAN PAUL.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

"'En Route' is the story of a modern man of letters, flung upon the full tide of Puritan materialism and sensuality, finding himself, when over forty, irresistibly attracted to Catholicism.... It is a book of which the appeal is for a far wider circle of readers than is comprised in the Roman communion alone. Its supreme merit lies in the rare force and simplicity with which it brings home to the mind the inevitableness of the great realities of religion and the absolute common sense of the mystic's life detached from the world by constant realisation of the omnipresence of God."—Guardian.

THE POWER of the DOG. An Entirely New Novel. By ROWLAND GREY. Author of "In Sunny Switzerland," "By Virtue of his Office," "Linden-Blumen," "Chris." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"One has to read the greater part of this story before one learns that Mr. Grey's title is not metaphorical, and that a real live dog plays the most important part in bringing about the tragic and terrible dénouement. Even if there were neither dog nor dénouement the book would be well worth reading. In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly original."—Daily Chronicle.

THE JAWS OF DEATH.

By GRANT ALLEN.

12mo, cloth gilt, 2s.; Paper covers, 1s. 6d.

"'The Jaws of Death' is a pretty piece of writing in the sensational line. It is cleverly told somewhat on the lines laid down by Poe when he undertook to show how to write a Blackwood tale. We are brought so smoothly, so gradually, to the very edge of the catastrophe the shiver of it is upon us almost before we are there. It is extremely creditable to Mr. Allen's invention."—Daily Chronicle.

"There are few better story-tellers than Mr. Grant Allen, and in this little volume we have him at his best. 'The Jaws of Death' should rank as quite one of the best of Mr. Grant Allen's shorter efforts."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"One of Grant Allen's racy stories as contrasted with the more philosophic tone of some of his works. The whole story is just that kind of thing which is specially appropriate to a pocket edition."—Sheffield Independent.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL'S NEW BOOK.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF BELIEF; or, Law in Christian Theology. By the DUKE of ARGYLL, K.G., K.T.

"It is refreshing to read a book inspired by a faith so vigorous and earnest. We have altogether failed to do justice to the wealth and variety of ideas in this remarkable book. But some of the salient qualities of mind which it reveals must strike every reader—the fervent yet reasonable faith, the solidity and consistency of thought, the manly confidence in the faculties which God has given us, the no less manly reverence and humility. .... The debt of the Church to such a book is great, and is twofold. For true Christian apologetics it is no mere affair of outpost and frontier defence, it plays the part which Plato ascribes to War in the development of the State; it exerts a bracing and purifying influence upon the faith which it maintains."—Guardian.

A NEW UNIVERSITY EXTENSION MANUAL.

Just out, crown 8vo, 6s.

SHAKSPERE and HIS PREDECESSORS. By Frederic S. Boas, M.A., formerly Exhibitor of Balliol College, Oxford.

"* This book is sold either as one of the Volumes of the University Extension Series, edited by Professor KNIGHT, of St. Andrews University (crown 8vo, 6s.), or as a Library Book (large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.)."

With Map and Etchings by M. Manasse, 2 vols., crown 8vo, 12s.

THE BIBLE IN SPAIN; or, the Journeys and Imprisonments of an Englishman in an attempt to circulate the Scriptures in the Peninsula. By GEORGE BORROW. A New Edition, carefully Revised, with Notes and Glossary, by the late ULICK RALPH BURKE, Author of "A History of Spain."

"Nothing better than the type, or than Mr. Ulick Burke's brief notes and Glossary, could be desired by the most enthusiastic Borrowian."—Times.

With Maps and Portraits, 8vo, 10s.

THE LIFE of ADMIRAL SIR JOHN FRANKLIN. Based on Private and hitherto Unpublished Documents. By H. D. TRAILL.

"A worthy memorial of the intrepid explorer who did more than any man to stimulate interest in the frozen North and to develop the geography of the Arctic regions."—Morning Post.

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

METHODS of SOCIAL REFORM. Essays, Critical and Constructive.

By THOMAS MACKAY, Author of "The English Poor," Editor of "A Plea for Liberty," &c.
"Mr. Mackay handles the subject with great ability..... He writes moderately and sensibly, and shows a thorough grasp of the subject."—Scotsman.

With Portrait, crown 8vo, 9s.

Franco-German War, 1870-1871. By CHARLES E. RYAN, F.R.C.S.I., M.R.C.P.I.
"Dr. Ryan, who voluntarily joined an ambulance at Paris, went through the whole of the Sedan horrors as a member of the Anglo-American Ambulance. He was a medical student, fresh from Dublin, and he was in the thick of battles, murder, and sudden death before he had worn his uniform for many days. The picture which he unfolds is fascinating in the extreme, and no detail is left out to give a complete insight into the truth about war."—Westminster Gazette.

A WANDERING SCHOLAR. By David G. Hogarth, Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford.

"The little book is one of the liveliest, brightest, and most informing accounts of travel in the near East that we have seen for many a day; and though one hesitates to compare a new book with the immortal 'Eöthen,' it is only true to say that Mr. Hogarth's pages have something of the same air of fresh, first-hand experience, and something of the same vividness of literary style."—Times.

"The spell of the East pervades this little book—written by a ripe and many-sided scholar and master of style. No better book of its kind has appeared since 'Eöthen.'"—Daily News.

LETTERS and VERSES of ARTHUR PENRHYN STANLEY, D.D., late Dean of Westminster. Edited by ROWLAND E. PROTHERO, Author of "The Life and Letters of Dean Stanley."

Popular Edition, with Map and 21 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE WILD TRIBES of the SOUDAN. Including a Description of the Route from Wady Halfah to Dongola and Berber. By F. L. JAMES, F.R.G.S. With a Prefatory Chapter on the Political State of Khartoum and the Soudan, by Sir SAMUEL BAKER.

"Of the chapters added to Mr. James's interesting book on the wild Soudanese tribes, the first, on the political aspect of the Soudan, is by far the most important at this moment, although those pages dealing with the routes from Wady Halfah to Berber are also of considerable value to readers who are anxious to comprehend the complicated manoeuvres of the Gordon Relief Expedition. The value of Mr. James's instructive book is greatly enhanced by the new chapters."—Morning Post.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN'S NEW BOOK.—2 vols., 9s.

SOCIAL RIGHTS and DUTIES.

"Nothing which Mr. Leslie Stephen has given to the world is better fitted to contribute to clear thinking on subjects of urgent importance, or worthily to exhibit the strong and subtle dialectic and trenchant style of the most serious critic and one of the most powerful minds of this generation."—Dr. MARCUS DODS in the Bookman. "There are few living writers whose style is more delightful, more easy, and full of charm than Mr. Leslie Stephen. Even in grave subjects his dry humour is constantly cropping up, his argument is relieved by graceful illustration, by historical allusion, by literary skill, and by apt homely references to every-day matters."—Daily Chronicle.

BY LIEUT.-COL. P. H. DALBIAC, M.P.

DICTIONARY of QUOTATIONS

(English). 528 pp., including Authors and Copious Subjects Indexes, 7s. 6d. (1) All quotations direct from original authors; (2) the best editions invariably used; (3) full references to the "chapter and verse" of all quotations.

"An improvement upon Bartlett's and other well-known works in that it draws largely from recent and living authors."—Times. "The work stands all ordinary tests, and the fullness and accuracy of its references makes it worthy of a place in every library where scholarship is valued."—Scotsman.

FATHER DOLLING'S BOOK. [Just ready.]

SLUM. By the Rev. R. R. DOLLING, late Priest-in-Charge of S. Agatha's Mission, Winchester College Mission. Containing the full Correspondence with the Bishop of Winchester. With 18 Full-page Plates, 6s.

PARTS of the PACIFIC. Illustrated by the Author and from Photographs. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"We have not had a book in our hands for many a day in which we had marked so many passages for quotation. Plenty of adventures by flood and field are to be found in this delightful book."—Daily Chronicle. "A really entertaining travel book. Its author modestly calls himself 'A Peripatetic Person.' His wandering habits have not, however, robbed him of a most excellent gift of humour. The book is as informing as it is entertaining."—York Post. "We have not lately read a book of travels more lively and entertaining."—Manchester Guardian.

JARROLD &amp; SONS' NEW NOVELS

THE POWER of the DOG. An

Entirely New Novel. By ROWLAND GREY, Author of "In Sunny Switzerland," "By Virtue of his Office," "Linden-Blumen," "Chris." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"One of the most charming stories recently published is Mr. Rowland Grey's new novel 'The Power of the Dog.' The book is full of the mysterious workings of the human heart finely true, yet delicate withal."—Spectator."In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly original."—Daily Chronicle.NOW READY, FIRST VOLUME in
BY A NEW AUTHOR, entitled
DUST IN THE BALANCE.By GEORGE KNIGHT.
"The style is smooth and succinct; the sentiment human and genuine; and altogether this is in its kind one of the best sets of short sketches that have recently been published."—Spectator.
"Mr. Knight has published a varied series of studies, each of which is marked by strong individuality and great charm."—Star.
"All the stories are remarkable in technique, the delicate shadowing of character rather than the exact delineation of the orthodox novel, the remarkably wide range of local colour, the astonishing variety of the subjects and the characters, all these are marks of the true artist, and all these are plainly evident in Mr. Knight's book."—Liverpool Purcellina.Now ready, 5,000 Copies of the First Volume of the DAFFODIL LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS,GRANT ALLEN'S Sensational Story,
THE JAWS OF DEATH.

12mo, cloth gilt, 2s.; Paper covers, 1s. 6d.

"The Jaws of Death" is a pretty piece of writing in the sensational line. It is cleverly told somewhat on the lines laid down by Poe when he undertook to show how to write a Black wood tale. We are brought so smoothly, so gradually, to the very edge of the catastrophe the shiver of it is upon us almost before we are there. It is extremely creditable to Mr. Allen's invention."—Daily Chronicle.
"There are few better story-tellers than Mr. Grant Allen, and in this little volume we have him at his best. 'The Jaws of Death' should rank as quite one of the best of Mr. Grant Allen's shorter efforts."—Aberdeen Free Press."We have greater novelists than Mr. Allen, but none who better understand the weaving of plot and the lurid and the lurid art of sustaining interest. 'The Jaws of Death' is a highly characteristic piece of work, and will afford as fascinating a half-hour's reading as any one is likely to get this season."—Publishers' Circular.

THE ANNUAL REGISTER:

A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad for the Year 1895.

* The first part of this volume (pp. 1-221) is devoted to a résumé of the Political History of England during the year 1895. The events of Parliamentary Life are noted, and the principal speeches summarised. Foreign and Colonial History is dealt with in pp. 222-410. In the second part a Chronological Summary is given of the principal events of the year, both foreign and domestic; this is followed by a Retrospect of Literature, Science, and Art, and an Obituary of Eminent Persons. A full Index is an important feature of the book.

* Volumes of the ANNUAL REGISTER for the Years 1863-1894 can still be had, price 18s. each.

LITERATURE.

Sheridan: a Biography. By W. Fraser Rae. With an Introduction by the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

"A SEARCHING and impartial Life of Sheridan will be a real addition to history and literature." So resolute is Mr. Fraser Rae on giving chapter and verse for every statement in these two volumes, that he has positively deemed it expedient to buttress even the foregoing scarcely disputable proposition, and by no less a prop than the name of Mr. Gladstone. (We are reminded of what Sheridan once said of Warren Hastings' counsel, that if they had occasion to risk the assertion that two and two make four they would infallibly quote Cocker's Arithmetic.) Perhaps, however, it may not be impertinent to observe that it needs no voice come from St. Deiniol's Library to tell us this, and that it would have been more to the purpose had the Hawarden oracle declared an adequate biography of Sheridan to be a debt trebly owing to that illustrious and many-gifted Irishman. For, surely, in the first place, such a tribute is in common gratitude due to him by those who claim the distinction of his name and blood, and over whom his fame has shed a ray of brightness; again, it is due on the part of the many who, in closet or theatre, have reaped delight and profit from his unrivalled plays; while, lastly and above all, it is due by the collective body of citizens of the vast empire whose august representative chamber was for thirty-one years dignified and adorned by his presence and transcendent eloquence. Throughout the nations of Western civilisation there prevails, as Mr. Sidney Lee has recently pointed out, an instinctive need and obligation "to do honour to the memories of those who, by character and exploits, have distinguished themselves from the mass of their countrymen." And, as he further shows, there is no form of national memorial comparable to biography, whether for perspicuity, publicity, or permanence.

Of the volumes wherein Mr. Fraser Rae undertakes to liquidate this triple debt it is impossible to speak but with hearty commendation. True, the work falls short of absolute perfection, which, after all, is only another way of saying that its author is a man with the limitations inseparable from humanity, and not—as Mrs. Malaprop would say—a progeny of infallibility. Sheridan's story presents many tempting opportunities for excursive moralising—opportunities which Mr. Fraser Rae has not always been able successfully to resist. There are, moreover, some few pages of surplusage here and there, such as the digression on the Fairies in chapter ii. of the first volume. Another fault, not so grave perhaps, but less pardonable because more easily avoided than those just mentioned, consists in the not infrequently recurring instances of halting grammar, and of words applied in an unusual or wholly unauthorised sense.* But, when all has been said, these are but venial slips—superficial blots which will have disappeared in the second edition; while, on the other hand, all the essential qualities of a competent biographer are here amply exhibited: industry in collecting and skill in marshalling details, unwearied patience in retracing the slenderest clues and disentangling the hardest knots, candour, impartiality (in such measure as is compatible with our imperfect condition here below), and, last but not least, sound common sense. Above all, the author is throughout careful to substantiate his story by frequent reference to original documents, and contents himself for the most part with placing unvarnished fact before us, leaving us to draw the moral for ourselves. He has been censured for not imparting to his book the character of a sensational novel! One shudders to think what a fearsome thing the originator of this criticism would have constructed out of the materials, had they been entrusted to him. He would, doubtless, have carefully prepared beforehand the spectacles of prejudice—nay, "a pair o' patent double million magnifyin' gas microscopes of hextra power"—through which he would have diligently scanned the "sensational" elements of Sheridan's character until the requisite degree of distortion was reached; then, carefully shutting his eyes to any detail not in harmony with the general effect thus obtained, he would have proceeded to delineate a monster about as nearly resembling Sheridan as, say, Mr. Hall Oaine's portrait of Coleridge resembles the actual lineaments of that much-belied man. From this mistaken course Mr. Fraser Rae happily keeps entirely aloof. He draws no fancy sketch—indites no apologia; he simply (to quote his own words) "narrates the facts of Sheridan's life."

The year 1770 finds Sheridan, a youth of nineteen, at Bath with his family, between whom and their neighbours, the Linleys, an acquaintance ripening into intimacy had arisen. "That modest, pleasing, and delicate flower," Elizabeth Linley, though but sixteen, was now the leading singer at the oratorios. Already Sheridan's mind revolved various literary ventures—plays, tales, epigrams, translations from the classics, dissertations on poetry, and the like—by which to win money and fame. His active brain spawned plans like a herring; but it was easier to plan than, pen in hand, to realise his fancies on paper. Halhed, a brother Harrovian now at Oxford, who shared in these projects, had written a farce on "Ixion," and this Sheridan took as the groundwork of a play on the model of "The Rehearsal," which he offered in succession, without avail, to Foote and Garrick. In 1771 the two brought out a translation of Aristaenetus, which, however, although a second edition appeared in 1773, brought not a penny to the authors. Moore, whose long series of calumnies reaches back to their object's seventh year, speaks disparagingly of Sheridan's scholarship; but his sneers are refuted by Halhed's letters, from which copious extracts are here given. Halhed, teste Dr. Parr, wrote fluently both in Latin and in Greek, yet here he gladly defers to his friend's superior knowledge and taste:

"I am never so happy as when I know you are altering anything of mine, for, by the word of a brother poet, I am conscious of my own ignorance. Pray, add and correct whatever you like; for I have some time had full belief and confidence that every correction of yours would be an emendation, and every addition a new perfection. Pray, do not hesitate a moment for my approbation. I have told you already that I most perfectly confide in your judgment, and am very happy that my trifles meet so candid a review."

Halhed was one of Elizabeth Linley's many adorers. After hearing her at Oxford he writes to Sheridan:

"I am petrified; my very faculties are annihilated with wonder. My conception could not form such a power of voice—such a melody—such a soft yet so audible a tone! O Dick, ἔρτα μουρον ἤξε, with Anacreon."

Other more explicit confessions of his attachment follow. Moore assumes without the least warrant that Sheridan, withholding from his friend the true position of affairs, accepted these confidences after he and Miss Linley had declared their passion to each other. The letters are at variance with this conclusion. Halhed's father procured for him an Indian writership in 1771, and the pliant youth, with many a longing look towards Bath, prepared to be gone. On this Elizabeth sent him, through Sheridan, a friendly wish for his "health and happiness"; to which he replies, lamely apologising for his retreat:

"Alas! Dick, that Miss Linley, of whom I dare not think but as of a divinity, should be the goal of the happiness she so kindly wishes me, and that in the pursuit of wealth—which is worldly happiness—I should every day get an irrecoverable step further from the only felicity of which my heart is capable. . . . However, as far as delicacy will permit, I would wish you to go, in presenting my acknowledgments for her undeserved commendation, and my wishes that her happiness may meet her in as precipitate a manner as I am obliged to fly from it; and use, Dick, your own eloquence on this occasion, for I well know the insufficiency of mine."

Thus it fell out that filial piety (and worldly prudence!) prevailed over love.

"Acon was grieved, he said, grieved bitterly, But Acon had complied—'twas dutiful!"

was a packet of twelve letters, written by Sheridan in 1772 from Waltham Abbey (whither he had been banished in anger by his father), to his life-long friend, Thomas Grenville. The elopement and the two duels with Matthews were now an old story; and Elizabeth, the secret of her French marriage still undisclosed, was back in her father's house at Bath, closely watched and unable to correspond, save clandestinely and at rare intervals, with her lover. He, cut off from his mistress, and having nothing else to do, perforce turned his thoughts to study and preparation for the Bar. His ambition began to revive, and he plunged with zeal into a course of varied reading—mathematics and astronomy, mensuration, geography, history, and languages (Latin, Italian and French). In his letters to Grenville he earnestly extols a public career as ensuring to the pursuer a happiness stabler than that to be found by "any, the most captivating paths of private enjoyment."

"A man in retirement," he writes, "rears his happiness on persons, not things. Of all others he is least happy in principle, or from within himself. Let his mistress or his friend die, or let him fear they will or that they may change, and he is at once completely miserable. The once harmonious strings of his soul, being responsive to the touch of so few hands, will never more make but discord when those hands are cold:

'Ask the fond youth
Why the cold urn of her whom long he loved
So often fills his arms!'

On the other hand, true ambition can never be disappointed; it hopes most when most oppressed, and the very scene which presents it with its misfortunes denies it time to feel, or opportunity to indulge them. Then its object is as immortal as the source of it. Our enjoyments here will ever depend upon ourselves and our own abilities; in the other they can exist but on the verge of accident, and others' caprice. Death cannot touch the object of the one. The other must live a slave to the dread of his dart."

Grenville responding to this with the platitude that we should rest content with the sphere in which God has placed us, his friend indignantly exclaims:

"I shall, one of these days, learnedly confute the idea that God could ever have intended individuals to fill up any particular stations in which accidents of birth or fortune may have flung them. The track of a comet is as regular to the eye of God as the orbit of a planet. And as God very often pleases to let down great folks from the elevated stations they might claim as their birthright, there can be no reason for us to suppose that he does not mean others to ascend," &c., &c.

The letters to Grenville are deeply interesting, revealing Sheridan, as Mr. Fraser Rae observes, "while his character was yet in its formative stage"; but, being rhetorical and diffuse, they do not readily lend themselves to quotation.

Both before and after their public union in April, 1773, Sheridan and Elizabeth Linley, when apart, corresponded almost daily. Her letters, like her winning self, have the paramount charm of simple frankness; they are, indeed, "silly sooth, and dally with the innocence of love, like the old age." In them, as in a bright mirror, may be seen the exquisite lineaments of her pure, modest, ardent soul. Shortly after their return from abroad, she writes:

"Eleven o'clock. Though I parted from you so lately, and expect to see you again so soon, yet I cannot keep my fingers from the pen, but I must be plaguing you with my scrawl. Oh, my dearest love, I am never happy but when I am with you! When shall we have another happy half hour? I declare I have not felt real joy since I came from France before to-day. . . . I really think Charles suspected something this evening. Duce take his curious head! I wish he would mind his own business and not interrupt us in our stolen pleasures. Is it not amazing, my dear love, that we should always have so great an inclination for what is not in our possession?"

The naïveté of this demure moralising is delicious. Their "stolen pleasures" were an occasional meaning word or look exchanged before a roomful of people! After the second duel the poor child writes:

"Believe me, I have not been in my senses these two days, but the happy news of your recovery has perfectly restored them. Oh! my dearest Love, I did not know till now how much I loved you. Believe me, had you died, I should certainly have dressed myself as a man and challenged Matthews. He should have killed me, or I would have revenged you and myself."

Soon after their marriage in April, 1772, the young pair were visited in their cottage at East Burnham by Mr. Linley, who, from having been his bitterest opponent, soon came to feel the warmest affection and esteem for his brilliant and amiable son-in-law. On his return to Bath he writes to Sheridan:

"I could find nothing to give me pleasure [on the road] but the reflexion of the happy hours I had so lately passed with you and Betsy. From my account of East Burnham to Mr. Adams, he will say Paradise was but a kitchen garden to it."

The King, who desired to secure the bride's services at his oratorios, offered the post of manager of the music to her husband; but Sheridan peremptorily declined, and then, as always, loyally supported his wife in her resolution not to appear as a public singer.

The beautiful woman was his good genius:

"The accounts of Drury Lane Theatre," writes Mr. Fraser Rae, "were kept by her with irreproachable care and neatness, and so long as she was able to give her time to this task, method and order prevailed and prosperity reigned. Moreover, she relieved her husband of the irksome labour of reading the MSS. of unfledged and presumptuous authors. . . . She never courted nor cared for celebrity, whether as maid or matron, the family hearth being always her favourite sphere of influence. . . . Yet there was nothing morbid in her disposition, nor any unworthy shrinking from doing her duty in all circumstances. On the contrary, she entered the world of fashion with a grace which was a second nature, and she shone in it with a beauty which was unrivalled and a brilliancy nearly as remarkable. Her love for her husband was akin to worship; he was attached to her with all the romantic jealousy and devotion of a lover."

Few, surely, have been the women in whom so many virtues and charms were combined. One lovely creation there is in the world of fiction of which, as we read Elizabeth's story, we are constantly put in mind—Mary Seraskier, Duchess of Towers.

One would like to quote from her humorous and pathetic verses, had not room to be found for some further extracts from her letters. Her sound sense evinces itself in the following, written when they had thoughts of retiring to a country life:

"My idea originally you know was to give up our house in Town entirely. . . . When you were obliged to be in Town, a ready furnished house would do as well as another for us, and would be trifling expense in comparison with Bruton-street. I wish to God you would reconcile yourself to this. Suppose people should say you had not means to live in so large a house, where would be the disgrace, and what can they say more than they do at present? You will never persuade people you are very rich if you were to spend twice as much as you do, and the world in general, so far from condemning you for retrenching, would applaud you for it. Do think of this, my dearest Dick, and let me have a little quiet home here that I can enjoy with comfort. God bless you. Good-night."

Next morning she adds:

"Tell me honestly, my dearest Dick, whether we ought in prudence to indulge our inclinations for a country life. Have you done anything in regard to the Prince of Wales which you said you would? If you could but get a friend to relieve you from these ruinous annuities at legal interest, it would make us quite happy."

Later on she writes of some arrangement pending with the Duke of Bedford:

"Do, my dear Dick, sacrifice a little of your fule delicacy (which nobody has to you) to our future happiness, and manage this matter. . . . As to Harris, I have no opinion of him, nor ever had. He is selfish, that is, quite a man of the world. Of course you are no match for him; but I trust you do not deceive me when you say you shall settle all things well."

"If you were not so worried, I should scold you for the conclusion of your letter to-day. Might not I as well accuse you of coldness, for not filling your letter with professions at a time when your head must be full of business? Don't, dear Dick, lay so much stress on words. I should use them oftener, perhaps, but I feel as if it would look like deceit. Pray, don't think I meant to send you a cold letter, for, indeed, nothing was ever further from my mind. . . . Whilst I live among people of the world, I own to you I have not courage to act differently from them. I mean no harm. I do none. My vanity is flattered, perhaps, by the attentions which some men show towards me; but that is all. They know I care for nothing but you, and that I laugh to scorn anything that looks like sentiment or love. I feel naturally inclined to prefer the society of those [Lord F. and H. Grenville] who I think are partial to me. As to anything serious, even if they had a mind to it, they know me too well to risk being turned into ridicule for the attempt. I never miss an opportunity of declaring my sentiments on the subject. . . . It is in times of trouble and distress that the real feelings of the heart are known. You, who think me given up to folly and dissipation, put me to the proof. Say, 'Betsy, I am ruined; will you prefer going with me to the farthest part of the globe, to share with me there the misery of solitude and poverty, to staying in the world to be still flattered and admired?' and see if I hesitate a moment. Believe me, my dear Dick, you have a resource if you really love me better than your ambition. Take me out of the whirl of the world, place me in the quiet and simple scenes of life I was born for, and you will see that I shall be once more in my element, and if I saw you content I should be happy. God bless you, and, depend on it, I should not say all I have done in this letter if I did not feel it."

Sheridan, who was jealous of his wife without cause, gave her, unhappily, some reason for lamenting his inconstancy. It is impossible to read without emotion the beautiful stanzas in which, after a disaster of this nature, she bemoans her unhappiness, and, in a spirit of angelic kindness, invites and encourages the wanderer's return. "His backsliding (we are told) did not last long, and his repentance was sincere and lasting." But their final parting came in 1792, when, after giving birth to a daughter, the fond wife fell into a rapid decline, and passed away on June 28, "calm and composed," preaching (says her friend and nurse, Mrs. Stratford Canning) patience and resignation to those about her bed.

Three years after Sheridan, then forty-two, married Ester Jane Ogle, a woman of twenty. "The disparity in their years," says Mr. Fraser Rae, "was not more marked than the disparity in their tastes, characters, and inclinations." Mr. Mulock, writing to the Hon. Caroline Norton in 1861, states from personal knowledge that she was "careless and self-indulgent," and in this way "contributed to swell her husband's embarrassments." In reply to her peevish complaints and reproaches, Sheridan prepared a statement of his financial affairs, "covering twenty-four closely written pages of quarto paper, written in excellent tone and temper, and giving a most able and minute exposition and defence of his life and conduct during his later years." Despite all mishaps, he says,

"I yet preserve my own self-esteem and hold it beyond all price or purchase, nor would I exchange the recollection of acts of kindness, gentleness, and benevolence which, without ostentation, I have in my life done, though accompanied with all my carelessnesses, for the more imposing character which others may have acquired by more prudent and punctual habits than I have had the good fortune to cultivate. And sure I am that there is no person who has been near to me and confidentially acquainted with my private affairs and personal difficulties, and who has witnessed my conduct under them, that has not been confirmed or improved in principle and integrity in his views and transactions in this life. You will forgive my having said this much of myself. It may be egotism; but it is fact. . . . I have never done a dishonest or a base act. I have never omitted to do a kind, a generous, or a benevolent one, when I had the power. But sins of omission, ah! me; senseless credulity; destructive procrastination, unworthy indolence, all abetted by one vile habit, somewhat perhaps to be palliated by an original infirmity of constitution (an occasional and unaccountable dejection of spirits without a cause and a constant inability to sleep), but never to be excused."

He expresses regret for his carelessness in minor domestic matters, yet, after all, he adds, "the bills do get paid, and most of the embarrassments turn out to have been unnecessary." On this Mr. Fraser Rae observes:

"Sheridan was severely punished for his laxity in never keeping a key or taking a receipt. When his affairs were strictly investigated, it was found that for every twenty shillings that he owed his creditors had received thirty. Well might he write in 1806 to his second wife, 'I am myself, I think, very much changed. I look back on the facility with which I have during my life been duped in every way and by everybody, and wonder whether I am posset of common understanding.'"

To return to the statement:

"I have all my life kept free from personal obligation on my own account. Yet for Tom's sake—to gratify his ambition and in the hope of finding him creditable occupation—I have incurred the obligation of the expenditure of not less than £8000 on the part of the Prince in his three attempts to bring Tom into Parliament—I, who for myself more than once peremptorily refused the offer of a moderate loan from him when I have been in the greatest distress!"

He then promises to arrange for the payment of his wife's debts and the securing to her a fixed income in the future. To effect this, he adds,

"I have broken through the rule of my life, which has formed its pride also, and have with a broken spirit stooped for the first time to solicit and accept the pecuniary assistance of private friendship."

Sheridan's second wife had not the winning qualities of the first; but we must forgive her everything for her devotion to her stepson Tom, and for the eloquent and touching letter she wrote after her husband's death to her sister-in-law, Mrs. Lefanu.

Sheridan, at all costs, ever maintained a rigid independence in Parliament:

"While on minor matters [says his biographer] he gave his vote for the Prince of Wales, he would not surrender his liberty of action on any question of principle. Even when a member of the Prince's household he supported Catholic Emancipation, to which the Prince was strongly and irrationally hostile."

"I shall continue," he writes to his second wife, "to consult nothing as a public man but my own self-esteem." And, again, "My price is not on this earth to do otherwise than what is right and go straight forward." In the same spirit he writes to the Bailiff of Westminster in 1814: "Never will I accept a seat in the House of Commons but on the sole condition of being master of my own vote and voice, the servant only of my conscience." He had, indeed, as he told Addington, "an unpurchaseable mind."

There are many new and interesting matters in these volumes which we have not even glanced at; but this is of the less consequence because our readers will, we are convinced, be led by the meagre account we have given of it to peruse the Life itself. It is, indeed, a notable achievement, of which the author has good reason to be proud.

"Thanks to his conscientious exertions," writes Lord Dufferin in the Introduction, "we can follow the hero of the story which he tells through the vicissitudes of his existence, with a clear conception of his complex nature.

Many of the absurd and spiteful misrepresentations which malice or ignorance had invented have been exploded by him once and for ever; among them, for instance, Croker's revolting and absolutely untruthful account of the sordid circumstances in which he represents Sheridan as having died, the real facts being plainly set forth in a letter, now made public for the first time, from his son Charles, who attended him in his last moments, to his elder brother, who was then at the Cape of Good Hope."

No higher praise, surely, could be given than this, nor need we add a single word to recommend a book so irresistibly accredited.

THOMAS HUTCHINSON.

Critical Kit-kats. By Edmund Gosse. (Heinemann.)

THESE are not really kit-kats; only magazine articles collected into a handsome volume, with a single defect: the poetical quotations are printed in small italic type, which on the rough paper is to aged eyes almost illegible. It is, of course, difficult to find significant or novel titles for such collections, so we may strain our imagination to view these twelve articles, each devoted to a dead or living author and made up of a little biography, a little criticism, and a little gossip, as "condensed portraits, each less than half length, and each accommodated to suit limited leisure and a crowded space." Though why in a book any one should want to read about Keats and Toru Dutt at all, and yet grudge space and leisure for all that Mr. Gosse has to say about them, I cannot well make out. Not so in a magazine, and magazine articles they are and nothing else.

There is an infelicitous, perhaps ironical, Dedication to a former fellow-tourist; but that is no affair of the reader, who need not read it. Mr. Gosse, indeed, is a Boswell of many Johnsons; for each one, as for all "established reputations," he has a lively enthusiasm. There are, however, among his "distinguished friends" not a few whose talent, as he does not forget to tell us, he desecrated long before they were distinguished at all. For clearly Mr. Gosse knows what is good and likes what is good; and if this odious public would give him a little more "space and leisure," he could carry his half-lengths a good deal farther down, and put into them more solid painting and less frivolous detail. But after all, if you live in Rome and write in the Roman magazines, you must court the Roman taste. So it is not so much against Mr. Gosse as against his Roman tyrants that we wag a sportive finger when we point to the Preface, where he solemnly says "that the eminent poet who for many years honoured me with his friendship, Robert Browning, laid upon me as a duty the publication of what I have written." This portentous secret was confided eight years before the death of His Eminence, and is now divulged in the essay on Mrs. Browning's Sonnets from the Portuguese. It is no less than this: that Miss Barrett positively wrote them during her courtship, while she was very much in love. And, further, that soon after her marriage she one morning pushed the MS. into Mr. Browning's pocket and fled. Whereupon the conscientious poet observes,

"I dared not reserve to myself the finest sonnets written in any language since Shakespeare's"; and so they were printed, but not under her original, more audacious, less plausible title of "Sonnets translated from the Bosnian." And now the murder is out. Let us control our excitement—it will soon go over. For, after all, we knew that the sonneteer must either have been in love, or else pretended to be. If pretence, the greater the artist; if sincerity, the better the woman. One may be a little the wiser, but not much the happier, for Mr. Gosse's reflections on the "psychological moment." It seems that "all the world knows"—alas! I never knew—that Miss Barrett eloped, and at the "moment" of her forty-first year; "according to some accounts in her thirty-eighth," for this not unusual "crux seems still unsettled," and Mr. Gosse prefers the more surprising to the more gallant date. It was really so much nicer not to know all the private secrets of this worthy couple.

But among these revelations one stands out of phenomenal singularity, of vast didactic value—yet, heavens! how lightly does Mr. Gosse dismiss it—just a few careless lines! It is this. During their courtship and honeymoon "neither poet showed any verses to the other." The elopement of Aurora Leigh and the Ring and the Book was a "crux" now once for all settled. This little secret speaks volumes—of which were there space we would fain write some pages—for both poets. There is something very wise, magnanimous, and delicate in their strange reticence. How rarely in real life do poet and poetess mutually attract, and when they do, how naturally do vague jealousies, clashing ideals, experienced suspicion as to the sincerity of feelings which assume literary expression, drive them apart? This little trait reveals in both the Brownings an unerring, a well-disciplined instinct, which was probably the safeguard of their happy and honourable alliance. Dismissing these matters, and coming to Mr. Gosse's criticisms on the Sonnets, we are on safe ground. His language is often somewhat ornate and metaphorical, and many of his points strike us as trivial; but whenever he gives his own mature opinion in a general summary we should hardly venture to criticise him if we felt inclined that way. In fact, in such passages he leads us along by his very real critical power, his careful study of the author, and his moderate, just, and judicious tone. To Mrs. Browning he is appreciative, but not more than fair. She was a real poetess, perhaps our only real poetess, certainly the only one who has sincerely and conscientiously divulged the whole compass of a woman's love. Yet her voice will soon be well-nigh forgotten, while the fame of Robert Browning will endure no eclipse so long as the English middle classes delight to recognise their native platitudes tied up in knots.

In the paper on Beddoes (to an edition of whose poems it formed the preface) Mr. Gosse fulfils another charge laid on him by his "revered friend," in divulging to the world the facts and the painful details of the poet's suicide. Somehow one hardly likes this; yet perhaps Browning, fortified by Kelsall's opinion, acted judiciously. When a man has proffered his thoughts to influence the world, we have a right to collate them with the broad facts and results of his life. In a case so abnormal as that of Miss Edgeworth's grim nephew, a too scrupulous reticence might encourage attempts at hero-worship. But here, too, Mr. Gosse holds the balance with perfect discrimination. What most inspires our confidence is the orderly system to which he has evidently reduced the literary history of the period. Each writer, each work, is fitted into the proper place; the immense importance of dates is appreciated; the causes of popular success or failure apart from merit are carefully considered; above all, we are never allowed to forget that too often neglected distinction between the intrinsic merit of a work and its importance as a factor in literary development.

The panegyric on Keats pronounced at the inauguration of some bust or tomb was hardly worth reprinting; still less the tattle about Mr. Stevenson and Mr. Pater. But the paper on Fitzgerald is very well done. On collating it with Mr. Aldis Wright's most unsatisfactory edition of the Letters, it is curious to see how cleverly Mr. Gosse appropriates and weaves in what suits his purpose, sometimes, indeed, in the process slightly forcing or distorting the meaning. Thus he winds up with the long quotation from Euphranor about the boat-race, pompously introduced thus: "Which Lord Tennyson, no easy critic to satisfy, has pronounced to be one of the most beautiful fragments of English prose extant." I cannot lay my hand upon the book just now, but am sure Mr. Gosse goes too far. Tennyson never "pronounced" about the passage at all. He merely praised it in some familiar letter or conversation. And the passage is neither a fragment nor remarkably beautiful—certainly not the gem of Euphranor. The chances are that it tickled Tennyson's fancy with reminiscences of "the pulse of racing oars," and so clung, as passages will, in his memory. He mentions it, perhaps thoughtlessly; Mr. Wright records; Mr. Gosse solemnly confirms the decree. However, to Mr. Gosse's serious criticisms I should only venture to take one exception: namely, his apparent indifference to the adaptations from Calderon. Going over Fitzgerald again, I certainly find less and less in his Persian work and more and more in his Spanish, and feel almost sure that if Mr. Gosse would give another very careful study to the versions (rough and unrevised though they be) of the Magico Prodigioso and the Vida es Sueño, he would have a great deal more to say about them, and that to very good purpose. Tolstoi and Miss Rossetti receive at his hands rather more than justice from very different points of view. The most fervent detester of interviewing will welcome his singular interview with Walt Whitman, which really throws a flood of light on the man and his work. Mr. Gosse's estimate of him is most clear, judicious, and helpful. The late Lord de Tabley and M. de Heredia are both men of whom little was known, but who are worth knowing about. Still more, Miss Toru Dutt, the most interesting, inexplicable personality which India has produced in our day. It is no small glory for Mr. Gosse and M. Theuriet to have been the first to recognise her genius. We wish this memoir of her were twice as long—so interesting it is and so captivating. Indeed, making due allowance for the form under which the essays appeared, we feel that Mr. Gosse has compressed into them an unusual amount of varied knowledge, sound criticism, and poetic feeling, and that we have been well instructed and well entertained.

E. PURCELL.

Riverside Letters. By G. D. Lealie, B.A. (Macmillans.)

ADMITTERS of Mr. Lealie's previous series of Letters to Marco will find a greater treat awaiting them in the present volume, which forms a continuation of his former book. Mr. Lealie's observations are more varied and subtle, his disquisitions not so superficial, while his drawings possess all the grace and artistic beauty which charmed readers of the Letters to Marco. Remembering who "Marco" is, the book might be compendiously described as the letters of one artist to another, so that persons who have not the magic gift of genius can at all events, under Mr. Lealie's guidance, enjoy sundry peeps into the wonderland of floral art. Thus they are soon familiarly acquainted with that riverside garden which spring seems to visit so early in the year, and where autumn lingers for the advent of the primrose and violet. They tremble with its owner before such a frost as that of January, 1895, and feel a glow of excitement as a flood runs off the tennis lawn, and once more leaves the boat-house no longer an island by the side of the great river. The birds, too, that the artist feeds during an iron winter become personal friends, while those who join him in his home walks learn to see contrasts of light and shade, novel effects in twilight and moonshine, different hues on the grass in the same meadow, according to the position of the sun. There may be nothing deep or recondite in Riverside Letters; but there is much that is new and pleasant in the common sights of the country which the author's genial personality invests with new interest, and irradiates every homely prospect with artistic light.

Perhaps the author is least at home in ornithology. It is amazing, for instance, to find him only just acquainting himself with so common a bird as the redstart, while his remarks on rooks and kingfishers are sufficiently commonplace. With regard to young owls, here is a story which he will enjoy, and which is not yet a fortnight old. Some young brown owls made their way into a fine Herefordshire church, and next Sunday the rector found a dead rat in the reading-desk and half a rabbit in the pulpit, which the tender parents had brought in for their little ones. As these remain masters of the situation, it is probable the rector will be able still further to replenish his larder, thanks to the devotion of the old birds. Mr. Lealie tells of a large perch which was caught in a sitting-room during an overflow of the Thames. The present writer knows of a trout left in a gooseberry bush on a similar occasion, and a large salmon killed under an ash-tree in a high road. Gilbert White's vein in treating of familiar natural history is by no means exhausted.

Mr. Leslie shines most in his love for his garden. His eager eyes scan his treasures daily to note any little detail of the birds and flowers. Most people will agree with his remark that, as a general rule, roses are pruned too severely. All rose lovers, fortunately, do not grow their favourites for exhibition. Therefore there is no need to cut the shoots too far back. The rose should be suffered to bear abundance of flowers, which to most minds afford more real pleasure than half a dozen blooms fitter for "honourable mention." Not everyone would agree, however, with the author as to the numerous "snobbish names" which are given to roses. May it not be that such well-known titles have nothing to do with morality, but have been given to the different kinds of roses simply because both buyers and growers remember these names better than they would less familiar titles? The Duke of Sutherland abides where "Simplex Munditiis" would speedily be forgotten. It is possible to be too precise in such trifles.

The wilderness of bloom in Mr. Leslie's garden must be delicious. No garden is to be commended that does not in some way reflect the character of its owner. We have sympathy for all the aberrant tastes of owners from the regulation ribbon borders of the gardeners. The wild garden, the fernery and rock plants, the collection of bog plants or of plants with variegated leaves, the curiosities of plants, again, such as the green rose and the like—these make up the chief pleasure of a garden to its true lovers, after the sense of quiet and innocence which it brings,

"Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade."

Here is a subtle remark of the author:

"In a garden it makes all the difference whether the spectator has the light behind or in front of him. When the light comes through the border towards you, every petal and leaf is enriched by transparency, and the colour intensified; while if the light is behind you and shines dead on the objects in your front, the effect is cold and opaque."

If the borders run east and west, however, this remark must be modified considerably. Mr. Leslie reminds his reader very truly that the best time to see a garden is in early morning, the very time when gardens are least looked at. He may like to know, also, that it is not unusual to find the Mimulus established at the side of a river. Thrown in from some garden, it floats down, and speedily roots itself.

The delicacy and daintiness of Mr. Leslie's drawings, which so greatly enhance the value of this book, go for granted. It is essentially a book of the garden and of summer, and as such will charm a wide circle of readers fond of birds and flowers.

M. G. WATKINS.

Love's Coming of Age. By Edward Carpenter. (Manchester: Labour Press.)

In the sub-title of his book—"a series of papers on the relations of the sexes"—Mr. Carpenter at once tells us what to expect; but the sub-title is printed on the flyleaf and not on the cover, which simply bears the words "Love's Coming of Age." It is only when the paper-knife lays bare the inner pages that the reviewer realises what lies before him.

The author of this book is a specialist, and he treats of the mysteries of sex with all the aplomb and assurance of his kind. If such pathological publicity were a good or desirable thing, Mr. Carpenter is to be congratulated, for his work is clever; but to most of us who still think of these questions with a certain reverence, it seems unnecessary to reduce them to the level of a healthy animalism, and, with however great facility, to print such conclusions in a book.

The specialist is too much with us, and in the ardour of his work he ignores the claims of reticence that his readers have a right to impose. If this were a medical treatise it would be admirable; but it is a medley of pathology, psychology, and a sort of loose sociology, and arrives at dangerous conclusions. Yet Mr. Carpenter is not prurient, and it would be hardly fair to call his papers unhealthy. His style is forcible and nervous, he is transparently in earnest, and he handles his subject with a deep appreciation of its importance—he is simply unnecessary. After chapters on "Puberty," "Marriage," "Woman the Serf," "The Sex Passion," and so on, he comes to the somewhat doubtful decision that we are all quite wrong at present, and that a judicious lust is the best stairway to the higher love; and while he realises that love is the great regenerating force, he bewails its rareness.

Indeed, Mr. Carpenter is quite lamentably discontented. He says:

"In all these matters it is surprising to-day what children we are—how we take the innumerable flowers and try to snip and shape all their leaves and petals to one sorry pattern."

He objects to what he calls the "cast iron" system of modern sex relations, and would like, if he could, to make sexual morality an appendage to a scientific theory, and teach us the old fallacy of reading evolution backwards. If, however, Mr. Carpenter's school were able to slightly relax the laws of marriage, the new yoke would prove harder than the old; for whichever way you look at it, Herbert Spencer's saying, that "no administrative sleight of hand can save us from ourselves," will hold good for all time. No reformers can hasten or conservatism retard our progress in these matters.

In this able book it is pleasant to be able to praise honestly, and there are a few pages with which most people are likely to be in agreement. Mr. Carpenter points out, and surely he is right,

"A child at the age of puberty, with the unfolding of its far down and emotional nature, is eminently capable of the most sensitive, affectional, and serene appreciation of what sex means . . . and can absorb the teaching, if sympathetically given, without any shock or disturbance to its sense of shame. To teach the child, in fact, quite openly, its physical relation to its own mother, its long indwelling in her body, and the deep and sacred bond of tenderness between mother and child in consequence—these things are easy and natural."

The precise value of "affectional" I confess is not easy to settle, but the idea of the passage is excellent. Parents are becoming more alive to the necessity of adequate teaching, but there are still vast numbers of children who first learn of the mysteries of sex as a subject for improper conversation.

At times one cannot help thinking what an excellent book Mr. Carpenter might write, if his subject were different and he would abandon his sex speculations. A certain section of writers are engaged in continually telling us how we should regulate or not regulate our passions, and such reiteration on such matters is wearisome and ineffective. A more earnest sociologist than any of them has told us that it is more profitable to dwell on the purer and more beautiful things of life; but they have forgotten.

Oh, What a Plague is Love! By Katharine Tynan. (A. & C. Black.)

The Mystery of Mr. Bernard Brown. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (Bentley.)

The Trespasses of Two. By Frederic Breton. (Hutchinson.)

The Real Lady Hilda. By B. M. Croker. (Chatto & Windus.)

A Rogus's Daughter. By Adeline Sergeant. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

Stages in the Journey. By Harry Lander. (Innes.)

The Modern Prometheus. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (Fisher Unwin.)

SELDOM have we read anything so fresh and charming as Mrs. Hinkson's Oh, What a Plague is Love! As she says Londoners said of Gardenhurst, the scene of the story, it smells of lavender and rose leaves. Like an Irish girl, it has "a winnin' way wid ut"; and from the first page to the last it holds you by the naturalness and naïveté of its conversation, the charm of happily conceived and brightly rendered character, and the irresistible attraction of a style so easy that it seems to be spoken rather than written. The presence of Duke alone in its pages should assure the success of the book—Duke the sweet and dignified and innocent silver-haired father, whose chivalry was always leading him into delightful love affairs which his strong-minded daughters would never allow him to develop into marriage. These daughters themselves are capitally drawn; and so is Arthur, the cocky and clever young barrister, who begins by behaving very badly indeed and ends in splendid style. But the member of the family who perhaps most captivates the heart of the reader is Fred, the schoolboy, whose notions of gentlemanly honour are so noble, his conduct so boyish, and who made so magnanimous an offer of marriage—dependent on certain boyish events in the meantime—to Beatrice. The only thing to regret is that Mrs. Hinkson should have sprained Beatrice's ankle for the softening of Arthur's heart. The incident itself is pretty, but the idea is old. It is becoming unsafe for heroines to walk the woods with young men.

It is unfortunate from the purely artistic point of view that The Mystery of Mr. Bernard Brown should deal with murder and suspicion of murder, for there is a note of real romance in it which raises it above the level of the mere detective story. And the detective part is, moreover, rather clumsily managed: it is inconceivable that the police should not have arrested Mr. Bernard Brown at the time of the murder, and every bit as astonishing that both Scotland Yard and the detectives should have allowed five or six months to pass before they acted on the evidence they had in hand. The character of Sir Allan Beaumerville, too, is rather what is required by the exigencies of the plot than one thoroughly consistent with itself. These are faults in a book otherwise excellent, rising, indeed, at times to a high level of interest.

Since Mr. Barrie and his compeers in the great "Kailyard Movement" have trained us to read Scotch like English, The X Jewel should find our hands and hearts open to its appeal. Its style is good, and the adventures of the hero are exciting. It is a story of Scotland in the days of Elizabeth, when James VI. went about padded "for fear of six inches of cold steel in the wame," and James Stewart, "callit Earl of Arran," ruled Scotland partly by intrigue and partly by force. Captain Andrew Eviot, the hero, naturally gets himself mixed up in international affairs, and also, equally naturally, in those of a fair and oppressed damsel; news and knowledge fly a deal faster than they can in these days of telegrams and express trains, and events pass very rapidly indeed; servants also show a skill and faithfulness nobody would expect of them nowadays. In short, it is a capital story, ending satisfactorily for the lovers, though suddenly and unexpectedly, leaving the Scottish king shut up in Stirling, and the X jewel itself practically nowhere.

In the midst of the Celtic revival which has overtaken us, another Highland story from Mr. Breton comes very aptly. We have grown accustomed to the strangely spelt Gaelic names, and the beautiful inversions and figures of speech in which the Highland mind appears to express its everyday meaning. A Heroine in Homespun was a powerful book, and attested its author's deep acquaintance with the Hebrides, their mental, moral, and physical products; and The Trespassers of Two will establish Mr. Breton's reputation as a connoisseur in these matters. Among the individual characters, little Flora, "the Flea," as her cousins called her, is perhaps the least satisfactory.

In the first two or three pages she promised to be a delightfully original child, and original she undoubtedly is; but her shrewdness and ideas are those of a grown-up young lady. She advises upon love, and comments upon and understands the life around her in a way impossible to a small person of her age. The innate dislike and contempt of the Highlanders for a Southerner (meaning an ordinary Scotchman) is well shown, as also is their loyalty to their own people.

Mrs. Croker always has a bright tale to tell, and always tells it brightly. She has a fine, healthy belief in youth and beauty: they invariably grace her heroine, and her hero is ever young. This is undeniably refreshing in these latter days of jaded men and storied women. The heroine in this case is a pretty girl whose father has been killed in pig-sticking in India, when he thought he had many more years to live and save money in. The consequence is that Gwen is left without a penny; and Mrs. Croker well understands how to draw the varying attitudes of her acquaintance to her and her charming Irish stepmother, according to the prevailing ideas of their financial and social position. Lady Hilda, or rather Lady Hildegard, has not a very important part to play, beyond serving as an excellent illustration of the gratitude of great ladies. Miss Skuce, "The Stonebrook News," is capitally drawn; indeed, it is rather for its sharply humorous characterisation that one commends The Real Lady Hilda than as an intricate story. Miss Skuce, with her presents of eggs, and her artless snobbery, will live for some time in affectionate remembrance.

Miss Adeline Sergeant has an admirable way of conducting a story to its proper ending. Under her able guidance you feel that there could be no other ending possible. Given these people, they can behave in no other way, and events cannot fall out otherwise than as she has ordained. Heroine after heroine she has led through difficulties, temptations, struggles, such as for the most part befall only these exalted creatures of the imagination—though creatures of reality they inevitably appear under her well-skilled touch. Hence, one's trust in her is now instinctive: one settles down, certain of a truthful, pleasant story, and content to follow Delia or Valentine or Nellie, or whatever the heroine may be called for the time being, through all the chances and changes of her life, confident that after more or less tribulation she will meet with her reward and—what appears to be more to the point—her husband. The "rogue's daughter," therefore, comes before you, makes her little bow, says her little say, acts her little part, and finally disappears from your friendly gaze in brightest mists of happiness, as all of her sisters have done before her.

Mr. Harry Lander's Stages in the Journey is a striking book. In it all manner of things are jumbled together—just as they are in life. The Failures Club had many members, men and women and "the parson." All who had failed in life—in literature, in art, in anything—were eligible; and a sad, riotous, drunken Bohemian crew they were, though above all things human. The book has not one but many heroes; but of the several women only one heroine—Dot Dally, the dancer—who smoked and was a comrade to the men, and did many things respectable women would shudder at, and yet had womanliness enough and virtue and strength enough, ay, and respectability enough, to have saved the whole Failures Club out of hand. It is a rapid, dazzling book; every kind of Bohemian figures in it; there is a maze of tragedy, comedy, and farce; yet in the end the types are all distinct. The strong artist, who found a motive for work and saved his soul alive; the gambler; "the parson," to whom the club taught many lessons; the shallow, fame-seeking girl; the clever journalist, weak and rotten at the core—all these are briefly, brilliantly, indelibly sketched in.

The analogy to Prometheus, senior, is not very clear in Mr. (?) Oppenheim's short romance. Unless the Princess of Hohenmahn may be considered to combine in her proper person the rook, the eagle, and, practically, Prometheus' diseased liver also, while the extremely womanly Adela plays the part of the rescuing Hercules, there is no analogy. Even then the torture of the modern Prometheus endures but for a single night, while Adela-Hercules suffers long, and finally the eagle herself flies off to fetch that indispensable hero(ine). In fact, we have to thank fashion and not much the events of the story for its title. This being said, there is much to commend in the little book. Except that the secondary characters are the merest puppets, serving chiefly to introduce the principals to each other, and elicit from them in the presence of the reader facts convenient for him to know, the conception and execution are above the average; and the descriptions and characterisations are distinctly good.

TWO VOLUMES OF VERSE.

The Flower Seller, and Other Poems. By Lady Lindsay. (Longmans.) Lady Lindsay is at her best in songs or short lyrical poems. These not infrequently possess a free and spontaneous quality that reminds one of the bird that "starts into song one moment—then is still." Less satisfactory than the "Cosie Song" (p. 130), which is a pretty lullaby, or the set of lyrics entitled "Lucinda's Letters," are the longer poems with which this volume opens. The story, or legend, done into verse requires more concentration of treatment than "The Flower Seller" shows. The pathetic element in this story is by mere diffuseness beaten out to extreme tenuity. Instead of each stanza contributing something of force and effect to the narrative until the climax is reached, not a few of the stanzas act as drags, and the stream of the story is almost stayed. The flower seller is a beautiful girl who falls in love with a victorious young king as he makes his triumphal entry into the city. She scatters her choicest buds and blossoms at his feet, falls in love with him, and pines away to death, dying as she is brought out to the city gates to see the king once more. "Outremer" has greater poetic distinction. It is the legend of a young monk, a painter of missals, who dreams of more celestial pigments than any at his command. A stranger from over sea visits the monastery, and shows the youth a wondrous book on whose illuminated pages he finds the very "blue" he has dreamed of. The stranger tells him that he had seen Giotto's frescoes in "burning, dusty Padua":

"Thence I came,
And oft have viewed the cool distempered wall—
The tint thereof imperishable, by name
'Beyond the sea' or 'outremer'; some call
It likewise lapis-lazuli,
A precious gem that's brought across the sea,
Beyond the sea in beauty."

He is promised a "shaft" of this blue from over sea, but discontent and unrest urge him to wander from his cell to the world beyond. Still dissatisfied, he returns at length to the monastery to find the promised gift of the celestial colour awaiting him in his cell. This mystical legend is set forth with delicacy and charm. But more charming still are some of Lady Lindsay's lyrics. Here is an example, from "Lucinda's Letters":

"O, but I'm happy! Let none say me nay.
I con the book you gave me ere you went;
I clasp the letter you so lately sent—
I'm busied all the day."

"What if sometimes the book shuts on my knee, Mark'd by a kiss? What if the letter's stained By tears that o'er its tenderest words have rained?
I'm happy—come and see!"

Ode for the Bicentenary Commemoration of Henry Purcell; with other Poems, and a Preface on the Musical Setting of Poetry. By Robert Bridges. (Elkin Mathews.)

"If music and sweet poetry agree,
As needs they must,"

so sings an Elizabethan poet. A pretty sentiment, and true of the age of madrigalists and lutanists, when the poet and the musician were one, and all England was full of music. But what becomes of this accord when modern music and modern poetry are met together? Mr. Bridges deals with this interesting question in a suggestive fashion in the preface to his Purcell commemoration ode. The ode itself is here printed in slightly different form from that it took when it was set to Dr. Parry's music for the Leeds Festival. While making it "more presentable to readers"—poetical readers one must assume—"it still betrays," Mr. Bridges remarks, "the liberties and restrictions which seemed to me proper in an attempt to meet the requirements of modern music." What the restrictions spoken of are will be preceptible enough to the reader. One thing may be observed. The ode of Mr. Bridges becomes a cantata in Dr. Parry's treatment. Now, a cantata requires a dramatic motif, let it be never so slight; whereas no such obligation burdens the poet who should produce an ode. But leaving this point, one turns with no little conviction to the observations Mr. Bridges offers on the impediments that hinder "the happy marriage of music and poetry." First, as to "repetitions." These are "incompatible," Mr. Bridges rightly holds. The "repeat" in music is not only legitimate, but significant and beautiful. But in poetry the iteration of the phrase is intolerable and inane. Is it so certain, however, that "the method of repetition" proper to music "does not suit the ode"? Dryden wrote a certain "Ode for Music," of equal fame with musicians and the poetic, wherein occurs the repeated phrase "none but the brave." With what Mr. Bridges says as to the essential difference between the rhythms of poetry and those of music one must needs agree. So, also, completely convincing is he on the "declamatory" style so much adopted in modern music. "It is a common idea," he says, "that by adopting a sort of declamatory treatment it is possible to give to almost any poem a satisfactory musical treatment." Mr. Bridges, in short, cannot admit that modern music is able to interpret satisfactorily almost any kind of poetry by virtue of a declamatory method. Here decidedly is antagonism. "To call a poem declamatory or rhetorical is to condemn it; and music is naturally less rhetorical than speech, so that in a declamatory interpretation of poetry music would seem to abnegate its own excellence for the sake of a quality foreign to itself and repudiated by the art which it is seeking to heighten." This is ingeniously put by Mr. Bridges, though surely "speech" is not the equivalent of "poetry" in this connexion. There is not a little poetry—excellent poetry, too—in English literature that is declamatory. There is Cowper's noble ode, "Boadicea," for example. I am disposed to consider some of the finest passages in the Purcell ode truly declamatory. Mr. Bridges is stately without being pompous, and dignified without stiffness, in this ceremonial poem.

J. ARTHUR BLAIRKIE.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE fifth volume of Social England, edited by Mr. H. D. Traill, will be published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. about the end of June, covering the period from the accession of George I. to the battle of Waterloo. This volume will contain an article on "Nonconformity and the Wesleyan Movement, 1688-1815," by the Rev. Dr. John Brown, of Bedford; an account of the characteristic features of the English agricultural system in the early part of the last century, and of the beginnings of agricultural improvement, by Mr. R. E. Prothero; a history of the development of the great English industries during the period of the "industrial revolution," by Mr. G. Townsend Warner; an account of the work done by Howard and others in the reform of the prisons, by Major Arthur Griffiths; contributions on the growth of pauperism, and the mistaken attempts at relief which aggravated the evil, by Mr. A. L. Smith and Prof. Symes; sketches of the military history of the Seven Years' War, the operations in America before and after the Revolution, and those during the Long War with France, by Major Gretton; articles on the great English painters of the period and the rise of English schools of painting, by Mr. Reginald Hughes; sketches of the development of English literature from its Augustan age to the Lake school, by Prof. Saintsbury and Mr. H. D. Traill; the progress of medicine, by Mr. D'Arcy Power; and articles dealing with the buccaneers of the West Indies, and the voyages of Anson and Cook, by Mr. C. Raymond Beazley.

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS will publish early in the present month a biography of the late Admiral of the Fleet, Sir Geoffrey Phipps Hornby, G.C.B., written by M. A. E., with three portraits.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. will shortly add to their new series of "Foreign Statesmen" Philip Augustus, by the Rev. W. H. Hutton, of St. John's College, Oxford, who wrote Wellesley for the "Rulers of India."

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co. will add immediately to their "Fur and Feather" series a volume on The Harc, in which the Rev. H. A. Macpherson writes on natural history, the Hon. Gerald Lascelles on shooting, Mr. Charles Richardson on coursing, Mr. J. S. Gibbons on hunting, and Col. Kenney Herbert on cookery.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN announces for early publication London Street Names, their origin, significance, and historical value, by Mr. F. H. Habben; and The Mind of the Crowd, by M. Gustave Lebon, which is described as a psychological study of that train of emotion, which makes vast numbers of people act simultaneously, and which is expressed sometimes by physical panic, sometimes by political revolution.

DURING the stay in England of the members of the American Congregationalist Pilgrimage to our Old World shrines, Messrs. Ward & Downey will publish a volume of essays by the Rev. G. C. Beazland, formerly domestic chaplain to the Bishop of London, entitled "May-flower Essays: or Passages from the Story of the Pilgrim Fathers, suggested by Governor Bradford's MS. History of Plimoth Plantation.

MESSRS. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS have in the press a new edition of Every Girl's Book of Sport, Occupation, and Pastime, edited by Mrs. Henry Whitley. Among the contributors are Lady Jenne ("Home Studies") and Lady John Hay ("Dairy Farming" and "Poultry Rearing"); while there will also be special articles by experts on cycling, golf, skating, photography, amateur theatricals, house decoration, &c.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. announce The Case of John Bull in Egypt, Venezuela, and the Transvaal, with illustrations by the author, Mr. M. G. Montbard, who may be remembered for his earlier book, entitled "In the Land of the Sphinx."

MESSRS. JAMES BLACKWOOD & Co. will publish shortly Chips from an Old Block, by Mr. R. B. Mansfield, whom we assume to be the author of two old favourites, "The Log of the Water Lily" and "School-Life at Winchester College."

To the forthcoming number of The Evergreen, to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin under the title of "The Book of Summer," Sir George Douglas will contribute a song, Fiona Macleod a story and a poem, Mr. T. W. Robertson "Summer Night Sadness," Mr. William Sharp "Oceanus," and Miss Nora Hopper (one of the younger poets included in his "Lyra Celtica"), a ballad entitled "Swan White." Mr. Patrick Geddes fulfils his part with a rural paper—"Flower of the Grass"—while sterner stuff is provided by the authors of "The Evolution of Sex." The artistic side is represented by Mr. Robert Burns, Mr. W. G. Burn-Murdoch (one of Mr. Crockett's illustrators), Mr. Robert Brough, &c.

THE claims of fiction will not be forgotten in the new series of the Cornhill Magazine. Besides the serial story, "Clarissa Furiosa," by Mr. W. E. Norris, which is now running, there will be in the July number short and graphic pieces by Mr. Henry Seton Merriman, author of "The Sowers," and by Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne, author of "Honour of Thieves."

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will issue immediately a little volume by Annie S. Swan, under the title of Kinsfolk, illustrated by Miss D. A. Drew. It deals with Scottish character somewhat on the lines of the same author's "Homespun."

MESSRS. JARROLD & SONS will publish in a few days the second volume in the "Daffodil Library" of shorter novels by authors of the day, to be entitled Sapphira of the Stage, by Mr. George Knight, author of "Dust in the Balance."

THE third volume in Mr. Fisher Unwin's series of "Little Novels" will be The Problem of Prejudice, by Mrs. Vere Campbell, author of "The Shibboleth." The situation is that of an unhappy wife, with a lover whom she repulses, though she reciprocates his affection.

Two new volumes of verse are announced for early publication by Mr. Elliot Stock. Iona: a Northern Legend, by Christabel Scott; and Poems of Love and Nature, by C. W. Cayzer.

MR. J. JEFFERY is preparing a work on Rowing for Dean's "Champion Handbooks."

THE annual general meeting of the Navy Records Society will be held at the Royal United Service Institution, Whitehall, on Thursday next, at 3.30 p.m., with the president, Earl Spencer, in the chair.

AT a meeting held on Friday of last week, the Lewisham Public Libraries Commissioners, with one dissentient, resigned office, in consequence of the refusal of the ratepayers to sanction the increase of the libraries' rate from ½d. to 1d. in the pound, the maximum permitted by statute. The Commissioners have been maintaining two lending libraries and three magazine and news rooms on the yield of the half-penny, but they find that the existing rate is altogether inadequate for the efficient maintenance of these institutions under their care.

THIS year being the ninetieth anniversary of the birth of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, it is proposed to commemorate her connexion with her native county of Durham, by placing a marble tablet in the church of Kelloe, where she was baptised. The treasurer of the fund is Canon Burnet, vicar of Kelloe; and the hon. secretary is Mr. John Robinson, of Newcastle, whose name is associated with the commemoration of many other local worthies. As there has been much dispute about the date of birth of the poetess, and also about her birthplace, it may be as well to quote the following extract from the parish register:

"Elizabeth Barrett Moulton Barrett, born March 6th, 1806; baptised February 10th, 1808; 1st child, daughter of Edward Barrett Moulton Barrett, Esq., of Coxhow Hall, native of St. James's, Jamaica, by his wife, Mary, late Clarke, native of Newcastle-upon-Tyne."

UNDER the title of "A New Novelist," Mr. John Hogben recently delivered an address before the Eclectic Society, Edinburgh, on St. Margaret, Dorrie, Sweetheart Gwen, The Little Widow, and Miss Grace of All Souls, by Mr. William E. Tirebuck.

ON Wednesday next, Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale of another portion of the "Bibliotheca Phillippica," which will last altogether for seven days. Among this immense collection of MSS. it is difficult to single out for mention any particular class: Latin and Greek codices, early English chronicles, modern state papers, topographical and genealogical collections. It must be sufficient to say that a large proportion of lots are such as ought to be preserved for public reference in the British Museum or the Bodleian. The catalogue is a fairly detailed one; but the compiler is under the mistaken impression that a MS. of the classics is necessarily rendered more valuable in so far as its readings differ from the standard printed text.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. S. R. GARDINER has been elected to be the first Ford's Lecturer in English history at Oxford. During his year of office he proposes to deliver six lectures on "Cromwell's Place in History," dealing specially with his foreign and domestic policy, and with the results of his government.

To the list of those upon whom Oxford proposes to confer the honorary degree of D.C.L. have to be added the names of Dr. Anton Dohrn (director of the Zoological Institute at Naples) and Prof. W. W. Skeat (of Cambridge). It is understood that Prof. Skeat would have received the honour last year, if ill-health had not prevented his attending.

MR. CHARLES SMITH, master of Sidney Sussex College, has been re-elected Vice-Chancellor at Cambridge for a second year.

SIR WALTER GILBRY, president of the Royal Agricultural Society, having offered an endowment of £25 a year for twenty-one years, the council of the senate at Cambridge recommend that a Gilbey lectureship in the history and economics of agriculture be established.

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH and Prof. E. B. Poulton (who only last year visited America on a lecturing tour) have been appointed to represent Oxford at the sesquicentennial celebration of the University of Princeton, New Jersey, which is to be held in October.

IN Congregation at Oxford, on Tuesday, a decree was unanimously passed, authorising the curators of the university chest to place £1500 at the disposal of the curators of the Bodleian Library, for the purpose of adapting the basement of the old Ashmolean Museum for the use of the library, and other incidental expenses.

PROF. MAX MÜLLER, having resigned the office of perpetual delegate of the Clarendon Press, Prof. York Powell succeeds him, while Prof. Sanday has been appointed an ordinary delegate.

MR. W. J. COURTHOPE, the new professor of poetry at Oxford, proposes to give a series of three lectures on "Life in Poetry" during the coming year. The first of these, to be delivered next Saturday, will deal specially with "Poetical Conception."

THE Rev. Dr. C. H. H. Wright, Grinfield Lecturer on the Septuagint at Oxford, will deliver his terminal lecture next Wednesday, his subject being "The Seventy Weeks of Daniel (Hebrew and LXX.), considered in relation to Modern Criticism."

THE prize for an English poem on a sacred subject, which is awarded at Oxford once in every third year, has been adjudged to the Rev. H. C. Beeching, rector of Yattendon, who, we may add, was one of the joint authors of that attractive anonymous volume, entitled Love in Idleness. Among former prizemen are to be found the names of the present Archbishop of Armagh and Canon Dixon.

THE special board for biology and geology at Cambridge have nominated Mr. J. E. Gray, of King's, to occupy a table at the Zoological Station at Naples, for six months; and Mr. S. D. Scott, also of King's, to occupy a table at the Biological Laboratory at Plymouth for one month.

THE University of Wales will be represented at the forthcoming celebration of the Kelvin jubilee by Prof. J. Viriamu Jones, of Cardiff, (Vice-Chancellor for the year), and Prof. A. Gray of Bangor.

ON Wednesday of this week, the Rev. Dr. Adler, Chief Rabbi, delivered a lecture before the University College Literary Society, on "The Faust of the Talmud."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Antiquary for June is without doubt a poor number. All the better sort of newspapers and many of the magazines will contain articles of the same kind as the anonymous paper entitled "The Antiquary among the Pictures." Why it should have a place in the Antiquary we cannot tell, as several of the pictures mentioned therein do not appeal to those to whom the historical faculty has been vouchsafed more than to any other of Her Majesty's subjects. Mr. T. Fairman Ordish writes well on Lincoln's Inn Fields. We wish he could be induced to let us have further notes on the history of that noble square. The Rev. J. T. Fowler continues his "Account Book of William Wray," the Ripon shopkeeper, and we are glad to say he is not at the end. The part before us contains the name of the Wakemen of Ripon from 1453 to 1576. The editor has illustrated his text with many most useful notes. We are sorry that the diary of the Rev. William MacRitchie comes to an end in this number. On his way to London he passed through Sheffield, where he was amazed at the cheapness of the cutlery and the great fortunes which were being rapidly made in that centre of the hardware industry.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

"RICARDVS HOLDFELD* ME FECIT. GILBERT MORDEN."

RICHARD HOLDFELD fused the metal,
Poured it in the mould;
"Men will see a goodly mortar,
When it hath grown cold."

"True and clear o'er leagues o' fenland, Sound the bells I've made;
At the casting of a mortar, Shall I be afraid?"

"I will stamp my name upon it,
Far off years may tell,
Richard Holdfeld made this mortar,
And he made it well."

Years have passed, and nigh three hundred,
Since that hour have fled;
Richard Holdfeld, Gilbert Morden,
Rest among the dead.

But his bells sound on; the mortar
Still untouched by age,
Its dead founder's name recording,
On our history's page.

FLORENCE PEACOCK.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TALMUDIC ELEMENTS IN THE "ACTS OF ABERCIUS."

Oxford: May 30, 1896.

The central incident of the Acts of Abercius as told by Simeon Metaphrastes (Migne, vol. cxv., col. 1230) is the visit of the Saint to Rome. It happened thus:

Chap. xv. Abercius had cast out of a youth a demon, who declared himself to be a centurion (katēpatēs) of demons. The demon, in a harsh and shameless tone, threatened the saint thus: "Quickly, O Abercius, I will cause you, even against your will, to behold Rome." And this happened soon afterwards. For Abercius fasted seven days with the brethren, when the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and said: "Unto Rome, O Abercius, by my providence shalt thou come."

Chap. xvi. But the wicked demon, who a little before had threatened the saint that he should thus go to Rome without delay, repaired thither himself, and entered into and at once sent mad a daughter of the king Antonine, who was already engaged, being sixteen years old, to Verus Lucius; and her name was Lucilla. The girl was distraught and cast down, and tore her own flesh with her teeth. Her mother Faustina (for so was called the Empress) was full of grief, as was also Antoninus, and they knew not what to do.

* Richard Holdfeld was a bell-founder at the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth century. He cast the clock bell at Trinity College, Cambridge, which bears upon it

"Ricardvs Holdfeld me fecit 1610 Resonat Trinitas in unitate."

There are bells cast by him in Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire; and I believe other counties. I know not who Gilbert Morden was.

Lucius had lately been sent to the east to war with the king Bulgessus; and on a fixed day he was to go to Ephesus to meet Antoninus coming from Rome; and there in the temple of Artemis Lucilla was to wed him with the goddess for witness.

So Antonine, to win delay, wrote to Verus that the Germans had crossed the Rhine and were ravaging Roman territory; and that, therefore, he could not go to Ephesus. So Verus returned to Antioch by Daphne.

Chap. xvii. Italian priests and Etruscan augurs were found to be of no avail; and the devil in Lucilla kept on vociferating: "Unless Abercius, bishop of Hierapolis, in Little Phrygia, come, I will not quit this tabernacle." Whereupon, Antonine advised by Cornelianus, praetorian praefect, sent agents to bring Abercius, bishop of Hierapolis, in Little Phrygia, with all honour and reverence to Rome.

The agents crossed the Ionian Sea in seven days from Brundisium, landed in Peloponnese, and reached by fast horses Byzantium.

The same day they crossed to Nicomedia and came to Synas, metropolis of Phrygia; thence to Hierapolis, where they met Abercius as they entered the city. He promised to meet them at Portus, after forty days. They accepted his words and returned to Italy.

Forthwith Abercius set out, picked up a comrade, Trophimion, a vine-grower, just outside Hierapolis, went with him to Adalia, there took ship and reached Portus three days before the date appointed.

The agents soon met him and took him on to Rome; where was only Faustina, the emperor having gone off to the Rhine. She ushered the saint into her daughter's room. The demon tore and threw down the girl and caused her to fear, to be troubled, to tremble and reel. At last he uttered this cry from within her: "Behold, Abercius, I have brought thee to Rome, as I promised to do." He answered: "Yes, but you will not rejoice because of it." And he ordered the girl to be brought out of doors. So she was brought into the Hippodrome—which was guarded by soldiers—and there, again, the demon tore her and boasted of having brought Abercius to Rome.

But the saint raised his eyes to heaven, prayed to God, and looked sternly at the maiden, and said: "Come out of her, O evil demon, my Christ commands thee, and do her no harm." And the demon said, with the cunning of a fox: "I, too, adjure thee by the same Christ, send me not into the desert nor into another place, but thither where before I lived." And the saint said: "Thou shalt depart not into a desert, but into thy native place. But since thou hast made me see Rome, I bid thee take up this altar [and he pointed to a stone altar with his hand] and carry it as far as Hierapolis and deposit it beside the south gate of the city."

The demon picked up the altar, staggered across the Hippodrome with it, before a myriad spectators, and set it down where ordered in Hierapolis.

When the girl was quite recovered, the Empress pressed the divine Abercius not to refuse to receive at her hands his due reward for so great and vital a service. He, however, would not hear of money, for what did he want with money who lived off bread and water? But he asked that near Hierapolis there might be built in the field by the river a bath, at the spot where he had fallen on his knees and the earth sent up a spring of hot water. He also asked that an allowance of 3000 modii of corn be decreed for the poor of the city. This favour was granted. The bath was built and the distribution of corn in Hierapolis lasted down to the times of the impious Julian. Then the saint went off to Antioch, thence to Apamea, where he reconciled the churches. Then he crossed the Euphrates and came to the churches in Nisibis and Mesopotamia.

Now the very same story is found in the Babylonian Talmud (Meila, 17b), and is cited by Wünsche in his volume of illustrations of the Gospels from the Talmud as a comment upon Matt. viii. 32. He writes thus:

"Dieselbe Gewalt über böse Geister soll auch, wie

Darf ich euch wohl begleiten? redete er die Reisenden an. Ach, versetzte R. Simeon weinend, der Magd meines Ahnherrn—der Hagar—ist dreimal ein Engel erschienen, und mir noch nicht einmal. Das Wunder komme, woher es auch sei. Darauf eilte der vermeintliche Geist voraus und kehrte in die Tochter des Kaisers ein (בכרתיה דיקסר על), und sie wurde (wie Raschi hinzusetzt) wahnsinnig, schrie immerfort, man möge ihr den R. Simeon bringen. Als dieser kam, hiess er den zudringlichen Geist fortgehen mit den Worten: Geh heraus ben Temelion (המליון צא בן), und derselbe gehorchte (זל). Fordert euren Lohn, sprach man nun zu dem Befreier, ihn in die Schatzkammer führend. Da fanden die Abgeordneten das erwähnte Interdict, welches sie sofort zerrissen."

There can be no question that the writer of Abercius' Acts and the Talmudist here narrate both of them one and the same story. The only question is, which writer has the priority. A learned Talmudic scholar informs me that the context in Meila 17b relates that the objectionable edict forbade Jews to circumcise their children and to observe the Sabbath; and also that the meaning of the Hebrew is not that Simeon ben Jochai accompanied the Rabbi Elieser to Rome, but only that he had the power over demons by tradition from that teacher. For the rest, the mission in question is quite historical. It was the Jews of Jamnia who sent it, Elieser was a member of it, and Domitian was the emperor to whom it was sent. The Rabbi Elieser lived till after 117 A.D., while Simeon ben Jochai was contemporary with Bar Cocheba. The Acts of Abercius cannot have been composed before 400 A.D., as the reference they contain to Julian the Apostate proves. The Babylonian Talmud was written down as early as 450 A.D., but the matter of it is much older.

In spite of the correctness of the details which it gives in regard to Lucilla and Lucius Verus, the Christian form of the story is more full of miracle than the Jewish. The preposterous story of the altar-stone carried through the air is one also met with in the Acts of St. Pancratius of Taormena; and the same sort of legend is common in the East. For example, in the Armenian Church at Jerusalem there is to-day an enormous stone, much kissed by the lips of pilgrims, which an angel having brought it thither through the air deposited in situ.

The Talmudic form is also simpler and less adorned. It involves no such absurdity as that of the afflicted girl being led out into the Hippodrome before the multitude. Without accepting it as historical, we must, therefore, at least admit it to be earlier than the Christian form.

But if this be so, the chief incident round which all else in the Acts of Abercius turns must be dismissed as a fiction suggested by an earlier Jewish story; and nothing remains to these Acts which can be allowed to be genuine, except the elegiac epitaph of Abercius; for the stone actually engraved with this epitaph was lately discovered by Prof. W. M. Ramsay in situ at Hierapolis, and is now in the Vatican Museum. There can be no question that the Acts were penned in the fifth century to explain the epitaph; and their author probably knew nothing more of Abercius than he learned from the stone. On it he read among other things that Abercius went to Rome and saw the Empress by order of the holy Shepherd:

Ποιμένος ἁγίου . . .
Εἰς Ρώμην δὲ ἐπεψεν δμῶν βασιλῆ ἀναθρήσαι καὶ βασιλισσαν ἰδεῖν χρυσόστολον χρυσοπέδιλον.

As a background to the mission so testified to in the inscription, he worked in the Jewish story. Whether he had any good reason for assuming that Marcus Aurelius was the Emperor in question we do not know; but it is possible. In any case, all the reasons and circumstances of Abercius' mission must be dismissed as fabulous, and no conclusions must be based on the story either as to the Emperor Aurelius' attitude to or knowledge of Christianity, or as to the condition of the Phrygian Church in that reign.

May we suppose that the very germs of truth which are lacking in the Christian tale are present in and underlie the Talmudic story? Probably we may. We know from Philostratus (Life of Apollonius, viii. 25) that Domitian slew the Consul Clemens, to whom he had given in marriage his own daughter (ἀδελφή). Suetonius declares that Clemens was a man contemptissimae inertiae. But Dio Cassius (67. 14) declares that his offence and that of his wife Domitilla, who was actually niece of Domitian, and was by him banished to a remote island, consisted in their having become Jews. Eusebius, however (H.E. iii. 18), declares that Flavia Domitilla's offence was Christianity, and Christian archaeologists have found an inscription to a martyr named Flavius Clemens. Yet the new religion which these kinsfolk of the Emperor adopted must have been Judaism, if we are to believe Dion Cassius, who further relates (68. 1) that "the first act of Nerva was the reversal of these sentences by the authority of the senate . . . and an act prohibiting all accusations of Jewish manners." Surely it must be this action of Nerva to which the Talmudic story of the tearing up of the edict obscurely refers. Nor is the supposition that a Jewish Rabbi expelled a demon from the daughter or niece of Domitian in itself improbable. We know from Josephus, for example, that a Jew named Eleazar exhibited before Vespasian and his sons (of whom Domitian was one) and his prefects and suite his power of casting out demons. This Eleazar may be the same Elieser of whom the Talmudic story is told. The chronology permits of this identification; and the familiarity of the members of the Flavian dynasty with Elieser's power over demons would explain the story or the fact, whichever it be, of the demon in the Emperor's daughter calling out for Elieser as the only person capable of expelling it. The recognition of Jesus, the supreme exorcist, by the demons in the Gospels was a fact similar in character to the homage thus rendered to Elieser by Ben Temelion. These considerations, then, point to the conclusion that Flavia Domitilla may have been the lady out of whom the evil spirit was expelled; and the entire story may be an echo of her conversion to Judaism by a Rabbi Elieser, perhaps the same Jew with whose powers the Imperial family had become acquainted in Palestine.

The statement of Eusebius that Domitilla was banished because she bore witness to Christ, and the fact of the discovery of an epitaph to Flavius Clemens, still present some difficulty. But both may have been Judaizing Christians, such as at that time were barely distinguishable from Jews. The Rabbi Elieser himself was once denounced to the governor of Syria as a Christian, and was on terms of friendly intercourse with those Jews who recognised Jesus as their Messiah.† Such recognition was at first all that was implied by the name Christian. It is a curious coincidence that Philostratus, like the Talmud, speaks of Domitilla as the daughter of Domitian, whereas she was his niece only, being probably a daughter of Vespasian's daughter of the same name.

But whatever the intrinsic merits of the tale in the Talmud, its mere appearance there finally deprives the Acts of Abercius of all claim to be regarded as in any way historical. We are left with the enigmatical epitaph of Abercius, in trying to interpret the meaning of which we must be careful not to use the Acts.

AN AMERICAN PIRATE.

London: June 1, 1896.

I see that Mr. Andrew Lang has been victimised by Mr. Mosher, of Portland, Maine, U.S.A., and that Mr. Mosher has replied to his remonstrances in a letter of incomparable impudence. In this case, the theft was of Mr. Lang's Aucassin and Nicolette, that exquisite version of an exquisite original; and Mr. Mosher's justification is his esteem for that work. His taste, clearly, is in a healthier state than his morals. But this gentleman goes after much smaller game than Mr. Lang: I am one of his victims. In 1894 he perpetrated a triple piracy. He stole Mr. Bridges's Growth of Love, first printed at the private press of Mr. Daniel, of Worcester College, Oxford; he stole Mr. Daniel's emblem and imprint; and his prefatory note runs thus:

"In issuing the Growth of Love, the publisher has desired to set forth the high estimate recently come to be held regarding the poetry of Mr. Robert Bridges. To do this effectually, no more fitting introduction could have been given than the contribution by Mr. Lionel Johnson, to be found in the Century Guild Hobby-Horse (October, 1891), and here reprinted entire. It was and is almost as inaccessible as one of Mr. Bridges's privately printed pamphlets."

Adding insult to injury, Mr. Mosher has presented me with a copy of this volume, of which dubious courtesy this letter is my public acknowledgment. Five years' practice in the art of criticism has shown me that my essay, in its first form, now "conveyed" and circulated by Mr. Mosher, is cumbered with a deal of surplusage and full of crudities. To the best of my present ability I have revised it, and it will appear in a volume of essays in the autumn. The pecuniary interest excepted, and the literary alone regarded, I think it a graver injustice to pirate a magazine article and put it into a volume than to pirate a book. The most finished and fastidious writer will often find much, and always find something, to correct and recast before gathering his magazine work into a book. In the case of writers young and immature, the procedure of Mr. Mosher is peculiarly cruel and unjust. Nothing, I am well aware, can check these practices; but I would beg Mr. Mosher to cease paying sugared compliments to his victims. If a foot-pad steal my watch, I am not consoled by his approval of its merits.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "LOOP."

Sheffield: May 30, 1896.

Prof. Skeat's explanation of this word is very ingenious, and probably right. His opinion is supported by the fact that in the North of England a loop-hole in a barn or old house is known as a "lowp hole," when "lowp" rhymes with the preposition "out." This brings us a step nearer to the Icelandic verb hlæpa.

I have examined a great number of old English farm buildings, and I know that loop-holes in barns were intended for the admission of air rather than of light. The practice is as old as the time of Varro, who, speaking of the nubilarium, or half-enclosed barn, says, "fenestras habere oportet ex ea parte unde commodissime perfieri possit" (De R. R. 1, 13, 5). A loop-hole in a barn, house, or stable is not only, as Cotgrave defines the word, "a long and narrow cleft." That, no doubt, was its usual form in castles and great manor houses. But in barns it often has the form of an equilateral triangle, each side of which measures about a foot. Sometimes the loop-hole is round. These forms bring us nearer to the sense of noose in a string.

We must not forget that in ancient buildings these holes were also useful for the escape of smoke from an open fire. By them the smoke would "leap" out. It is also important to notice that in the oldest chimneys—as, for example, at Aydon Castle, in Northumberland—the smoke escaped by vertical slits in the side of the wall, just below the eaves.

"FAUST" TRANSLATIONS.

The Cedars, Oxford: May 30, 1896.

"Christ ist erstanden!
Selig der Liebende
Der die betrübende
Hellsam' und übende
Prüfung bestanden."

Since Mr. R. McLintock, in the ACADEMY of December 28, 1895, mentioned "a very small point" in the English translation of these lines, I have examined forty-nine different versions of Goethe's "Faust," in six different languages. Less than one-half of the English translations understand the lines as Mr. McLintock does, and some of the remainder are doubtful. I am, however, not convinced by Mr. McLintock's views as to the chorus of angels. "Ascended" seems to me the true phrase. Christ, according to Christian belief, "descended into hell, the third day He rose again." And in Easter hymns surely Christians will speak not merely of His resurrection but of His ascension. Mr. McLintock's translation of "der Liebende" seems a very forced one. Christ to Christians is eminently "der Liebende." He was tried, in His mortal form, and elevated by affliction, so that the language of Goethe seems eminently applicable to him.

EMENDATIONS OF PROPERTIUS.

Scripta B. Risberg, phil. doct. (Apud Lundequistaka Bokhandeln, Upsalæ.)

In the seventy pages of this pamphlet, Dr. Risberg has dealt clearly and carefully with forty-eight passages of Propertius; and if his suggestions are not always convincing, yet his work must be taken into account by future editors.

This first emendation is certainly happy—I. 3. 16, "oculaque admota sumere inerma manu" (et arma MSS., avara Baehrens, rara Palmer). Attractive also is II. 2. 7, aut ceu for aut cum, whereby we gain the particle needed to indicate comparison, without losing aut. Book III. 8 ("Dulcis ad hesternas," &c.) certainly gains greatly in clearness if we read tacite with Risberg in 26 ("aut tacite digitis scripta silenda notas," tua cum MSS.), and with Vahlen and Risberg place 25, 26 after 11 and 12, so that the cause of the woman's jealousy is her detection of a secret message at table to a rival. But the subject of remittis and notas in this way becomes indefinite; should we not then make a further change to remittas and notas?

On III. 17. 12 Risberg objects against Housman's "spesque timorque animae versat utroque modo," that not the wavering, but the anxiety of the mind is in question; and his own combination of Palmer's utroque toro with animi ("corpus non animus in lecto versatur") seems as satisfactory an emendation as conjecture can give us. He treats at some length the very difficult lines III. 24. 11, 12, and he proposes to read as follows vv. 9-12:

"Quod mihi non patril poterant avertere amici,
Eluere aut vasto Theasala saga mari,
Neclego, non ferro non igne coactus et ipse
Naufragus Aegaea (vera fatebor) aqua."

In 11 the MSS. give haso ego. His interpretation is:

"Amorem insanum, quo nemo adhuc potuit me liberare, ipse jam neglego, non ferro neque igne coactus (i.e., sine remedio extrinsecus petito) et quamquam mari vere Aegaeo naufragus fui—i.e. quamquam propter maximum amorem in Cynthiam perfidam et saevam ad ultimam desperationem adductus fui, id quod me fateri necesse est."

This interpretation of Aegaea aqua he defends at some length, comparing vv. 15, 16 of this elegy, and also (inter alia) Hor. C. I. 5. 5, Ov. A. A. 1. 411.

In Book IV. Risberg has dealt with three poems only. In the fifth elegy, by making vv. 47, 48 precede 45, 46 he greatly improves the sequence of the passage, while at for et in 29 meets Otto's objection that as the poem stands et is meaningless. He defends virum pretium facit, but suggests "At simula duram: pr. f." Cantica (45) implies a histrion (cf. miles 49, nauta 50, barbara colla 51). He points out that the artifice advised in v. 29 is exemplified in vv. 31-44.

On IV. 6. 83, 84 Risberg shows very well that nigras harenas refers to the lower world; he suggests that Propertius added 11 and 12, 67 and 68, in order to adapt the poem for his volume of Altra, while he intended to omit 1-10, 13, 14, and 69-86; the present combined form is due to the poet's editors. On IV. 8. 41 a reference to Juvenal 8. 32 ("Nanum cujusdam Atlanta vocamus") restores the MS. Magnus as the name of the dwarf.

One other passage may be mentioned before concluding. In I. 8 Risberg reads succedere for subsidiere in 13, with no 11, auserat 14, and v. 12 in brackets: the meaning is "Utinam gravis hiems te diu impediatur neve tu post hiemem ventos nactus secundos proficiscaris." Yet this leaves non videam quite unjustifiable: non videam is not like non aliena in v. 18, nor is videam potential (Postgate's "I would not" is ambiguous). The non is to be explained from the emphasis thrown on it by the contrast between Propertius' anxiety for Cynthia's delay, and his anxiety for her safety once she was started. Atque = "and yet" (Postgate) and non is emphatic: the line must be classed with other instances of emphatic non for ne, where there is no contrasted positive volition, nor does the negative go closely with any one word. Such instances are Cic. ad Att. XI. 8. 3: "Quo [die] utinam susceptus non essem, aut ne quid ex eadem matre postea natum esset"; Ovid, A. A. 3. 129, Juv. 6. 451, Mart. I. 55. 13; and several instances of non after utinam, which are quoted by Draeger H. S. I. 315.

In conclusion, I can only express the hope that Dr. Risberg's pamphlet may attract the attention of students of his author.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE annual Ladies' Conversazione of the Royal Society will be held at Burlington House on Wednesday next.

THE mayor of Bristol, in response to a local deputation, has promised to invite the British Association to hold its meeting in 1898 at Bristol.

THE gold medal of the Linnean Society, which is presented alternately to a zoologist and to a botanist, has this year been awarded to Dr. G. J. Allman, emeritus professor of natural history in the university of Edinburgh, in recognition of his distinguished researches in zoology. So far back as 1873 he received the royal medal of the Royal Society.

THE following awards have been made by the council of the Royal Geographical Society: the founder's medal, to Sir William Macgregor, for his long-continued services to geography in British New Guinea, in exploring and mapping both the interior and the coast-line, and in giving information on the natives; the patron's medal, to Mr. St. George R. Littledale, for his three important journeys in the Pamirs and Central Asia; the Murchison grant, to Yusuf Sharif Khan Bahadur (native Indian surveyor), for his work in Persian Baluchistan and elsewhere; the Gill memorial, to Mr. A. P. Low (of the Canadian Survey), for his five explorations in Labrador; the Back grant, to Mr. J. Burr Tyrrell (also of the Canadian Survey), for his two expeditions in the Barren Ground of North-East Canada; and the Cuthbert Peek grant, to Mr. Alfred Sharpe, for his journeys during several years in Central Africa.

LIEUT. PEARY, the Arctic explorer, is coming to England in the early part of June, his main purpose being to present in person an account of his explorations in Northern Greenland to the Geographical Society. Lieut. Peary, who will be accompanied by his wife, can spend only a few days here. On his return to the United States he will make preparations for another expedition to the north coast of Greenland.

At a meeting of the Anthropological Institute, to be held at Hanover-square on Tuesday next, Mr. H. W. Seton Karr will exhibit some flint implements from the Egyptian desert, and a collection of photographs taken in Somaliland; General Robley will exhibit a collection of tattooed heads from New Zealand; and the following papers will be read—"An Account of some Skulls discovered at Brandon, Suffolk," by Mr. O. S. Myers; and "Social Life in Fanti-land," by Dr. R. M. Connolly, illustrated with the optical lantern.

THE Rolleston memorial prize, which is open to graduates of either Oxford or Cambridge, has been awarded to Mr. Horace M. Vernon, of Merton, for his dissertations on (1) "The Effect of Environment on the Development of Echinoderm Larvae," (2) "The Relation of the Respiratory Exchange of Cold-blooded Animals to Temperature," and (3) "The Respiratory Exchange of the Lower Marine Invertebrates."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At the meeting of the Royal Asiatic Society, to be held in Albemarle-street on Tuesday next, Mr. D. M. de S. Wickremasinghe will exhibit a Ceylon rosary, and a short paper by Dr. L. A. Waddell on "Ceylon Rosaries" will be read. The secretary (Prof. T. W. Rhys Davids) will also read a paper by Mr. J. Takakusu, on "The Discovery of a Pāli Work in the Chinese Buddhist Collection."

PROF. J. P. MAHAFFY, of Trinity College, Dublin, has been elected a corresponding member of the Austrian Academy of Sciences.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

VIKING CLUB.—(Friday, May 15.)

G. M. ATKINSON, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—The Rev. E. McClure read a paper on "Scandinavian Topographical and Personal Nomenclature in the British Islands." He began by giving a short account from the Saxon Chronicle and the Irish Annals of the first appearance of Scandinavian sea rovers on the coast of these islands between 787 and 795 A.D. The motives which led to these expeditions were discussed, and it was pointed out that the Shetland Islands were probably the first landfall made by the Norwegians in these voyages. These islands were then occupied by Picts, among whom a band of Irish missionaries had been at work from the early part of the sixth century. The invaders, as we see from the Sagas, called the islands Hjalta-land. Efforts had been made to find a Norse etymon for Hjalta, but a Pictish origin seems more probable. The Celticized form—which survives in the modified "Shetland"—was probably Shialta-land, a supposition which is supported by the term "Sheltie" for a Shetland pony. Initial Celtic s tends, as we know, to glide in Cymric into l, and the Picts of the eighth century spoke a language akin to Cymric. This was an adopted speech, according to Prof. Rhys; and "Shialta"—or Hjalta—may be an element of their original vocabulary, as probably was also the "Orc" in Orkades. Pomona in the Orkneys, if it is not a fanciful name of comparatively late composition, suggests a similar origin. With the exception of these, and a few names of other islands in these groups, the whole topographical nomenclature of the Orkneys and Shetlands is Norse—s.g., Voe (vögr = a creek), Skaw (skagi = a low headland, in contradistinction to höfða, a high headland), Ness, Wick (vík), Firth (fjörðr), Holm, applied to uninhabited islands, Sound (saund), Öföri in Orphir = ebbing, and in Urfassey (örferis-ey = an island connected with the mainland at low-water), Ayre (eyrr = a gravelly bank or spit), Ster and Sta (from staðr, "stead," or stær, a mountain pasture), Quoy, Quay (from kvi, plural kviar, a fold or pen), Skall (a sheeling), Shaw (skogr = shady place, Noup and Nip from gnúpr = a peak, cf. Gaitnup = Goat Peak, Hóp in St. Margaret's Hope, a sheltered haven. The place-names in the Landnama Book and in the Sturlunga Saga are very helpful in enabling us to separate pure Scandinavian names in these islands from those which owe their origin to other Low Germanic tongues. Iceland was discovered by the Norwegians about 850, and here as well as in Orkney and Shetland and the Hebrides Irish priests and monks had found settlements from the sixth century. The Norwegians used the word Pappa to designate these missionaries, and numerous islands in these regions still preserve the name—Pappay, Pabbey, &c. This word was evidently borrowed, like Kirkys, from people familiar with Greek ecclesiastical nomenclature. Whence did this pagan folk receive them? The lecturer contended that they had got them—as the pagan Angles and Saxons did the word "church"—from the Christianised Goths of the Roman Empire. The German Paffe was obtained from the same source. The churches, with their shrines and richly covered books, were the chief objective in their piratical expeditions. They dared the storms and the dangerous navigation of the rock-fringed islands and promontories of the western coast to pillage the shrines of Iona, Alt-Clyde, Bangor in co. Down, Menevia (St. David's) in Wales, and other celebrated ecclesiastical centres. They ran through the North Sea to ravage Lindisfarne, Crowland, and other known shrines upon our eastern coast. The Wars of the Gaoll and the Gaedhel, the Annals of Ulster, the Chronicon Manniae, the Chronicon Scottorum, the Annales Cambriae, the Saxon Chronicle, are filled with accounts of their depredations from 795 A.D. until well on in the twelfth century. They were ubiquitous in their descents; but the western coasts of our islands preserve perhaps the most marked records of their navigation. There is not a headland, not a half-sunken rock, not the smallest scrap of an island in our western waters, which had not been charted in some way by these navigators, and which have not afterwards found their way into our maps. It would be tedious even to enumerate the points of importance to navigation among the Hebrides which had found a record in Norse speech before the names came into our sailing charts. The Skeirs and Skerries, Nesses and Flords, Sounds and Wicks, beyond number, besides the many Eys (islands) scattered along the west coast, indicate something of the careful mode of their navigation, as well as the retentiveness of their memories in storing up the results of their seafaring experience. Perhaps they had some means, unknown to us, of making charts, and of thus steering their way through the network of Sands and Skerries and islands which that western sea presents. The names they gave to each of these spots all doubtless carry with them some connotation which helps the navigator; there is the ordinary Skeir, and the Hå-Skeir, and the Deasker, whatever that may mean. There is the Skellay with its shelly beach, and the Sands with its sand, the Pabbay with its lone monastery of world-renouncing Irish monks, the Valley that promises vellir, or fields of rich grass behind its rocky shore. If we knew the significance of all these compound-names of the western isles, we should recognise an appropriateness in every designation which does not contain a personal name—Borerray, Bernerray, Raray, Euskay, Voterray, Saundray, &c. The debt we owe to the Norsemen for these first lessons in navigation it would be difficult to over-estimate. We owe the names of Ireland and of three of its four provinces, besides the islands and important inlets on its eastern coast, to the Scandinavians. Ulster, with its island of Rathlin, and its Carlingford and Strangford; Leinster, with its coast of the Fingalle, its Boldoyle, its Ireland's-Eye (distinguished from Angles-ey on the opposite Welsh coast); its Howth Hill, its Wicklow, its Wexford, its Lambay, its Lixlip, &c.; Munster, with its Waterford (Wetherfjörðr) have all passed from the Norse navigators' lips to our charts of to-day. The lecturer cited many names of places and persons still to be found in these islands as indicating the extent of Norse influence. Worsaae, in his Minder, dealt with this subject some fifty years ago, and Dr. Isaac Taylor supplemented his results by a more thorough examination of Scandinavian names in England. But the subject is not an easy one. The Lowlanders in Scotland and the Angles of our northern counties represent a people speaking a language closely related to that of the Danes and Norsemen. We cannot, therefore, always separate the Norse from the Anglo names in Scotland and Northern England. Some names, like "force" and "fell," are thoroughly distinctive, while others are common to almost the whole Low Germanic family. Dr. Vigfusson cites from a Byzantine writer the use of the former of these words for "waterfall" in the times of the Varinagar. The personal names are more distinctive. Worsaae maintained that the termination -son in surnames is a proof of Scandinavian influence, it being found only in regions where the Northman and the Dane have held sway—e.g., North Holland, the Lowlands of Scotland, and the east coast of England. Celticised Scandinavian personal names are to be found in the Hebrides, the West Highlands, Galloway, Sodor and Man, and all over Ireland. The Macleods of the Lewis and Harris call themselves the Siol (that is, seed) Torcuil (Thorketil, Thorkill) and Siol Tormond (Thormadr), respectively. The MacQuarries belong to the Siol Guaire (Guðriðr). In the Collectanea de Rebus Albanicis, the genealogies of most of the Highland clans are given, and in the majority of them familiar Norse forms appear. MacAwley (Ólaf), Haldane, and McOaldin, and McAldin (Hafan), McDugal, MacDowall, McOoull, all forms of "Son of the Black Foreigners," McQuistin (Kystein), McLochlan, son of the Lochlannoch, or Man from the lochs or firths, McOorkle, and McOorkell (= MacThorkill), McOorquodale (= McThorketill), McAralt (Harald), McLagman, alias McLamont, alias McClymont, alias McCalmont, all from Lagmadr or Law Man. The Olan Somarlie is so-called from Somer-led = the summer soldier, McOrinnell and McOrannell = son of Ragnald, McRory (Rodrick), McIvar (Ivar), McKetterick = McSigtryg). In Ireland we have the same or similar names; but McAuley becomes McAuliffe; and MacMannus (Magnus-son) is more common than any of the others. In the Isle of Man the surname Oasement is the modern form of MacAsmundr; Castell, MacOakell (1511) = MacAskell, for MacAakettell; Ootter for MacOttarr (Ot-hari), Corkell for McThorkell, Corlett for MacThor-ljotr, Orennell and Orenilt for MacRagnvald, Cowley for MacOlaf, Gores and Garry for MacGoðfreyðr, of the Irish McGuffry and McCaffrey. —Mr. F. T. Norris (hon. editor) said that the lecturer's paper was so full of information that any adequate criticism must be reserved till it appeared in print. He did not think it likely that ecclesiastical terms were introduced into the North through the Christianised Goths, as the change of faith of the Northern people took place at a much later period. With regard to racial characteristics, the lecturer's statement that in Denmark brachycephalic skulls were found very similar in type to skulls admitted to be Celtic was noteworthy. He had also noticed in Denmark and Norway river names that appeared to be Celtic, such as Afven, recalling the Avon; either the English Avon was not Celtic or the Norse Afven was not Norse. He had, however, doubts as to a Celtic population appearing in Denmark; and he questioned whether some of the brachycephalic skulls were not Huguenotic, as the Huguenot immigration into both Denmark and Norway was considerable, so much so that the importance of the town of Bergen was largely due to their settlement there. The identity of Herethaland, from which the first "Danes" who invaded England came, according to the Saxon Chronicle, was much in dispute; and though many thought, with the lecturer, that Heredeland in Jutland was meant, the theory that it was Hordeland in Norway was no less tenable. The lecturer had compared the forms Shetland and Hjaltaland, and ascribed the name to a Celtic origin; and he thought this was borne out by the other Celtic forms mentioned, such as Sabrina and Hafren for the river Severn. The history of ancient place-names would be greatly elucidated by anyone who would compile a key of the consonant interchanges incident to the Latin, Teutonic, and Celtic tongues. In stating that the early inhabitants of Britain were the Gaedhel and Gaill, was not the important contribution of the Belgae overlooked? These formed a portion of a Teutonic element in Britain in the period supposed to be purely Celtic. Too much stress should not be laid on the identification of "Orkney," &c., as Celtic words, for the Roman form Orcaades might just as easily be a Teutonic donation by some one of the earliest Teutonic settlers here prior to, or contemporaneous with, the Roman period. The lecturer had traced religious terms in the North to the Greek Church through the Goths, and the parallels of church and kirk with kyriakē were evidence in point; but if such terms were so derived, they might just as well have come through the Christianised Greeks of Marseilles. With respect to the earliest inhabitants of the Orkneys, however, the name of Egilsay, if so called from the church on the island, and not from the personal name Egil, pointed to a Latin origin rather than a Greek, as the word ecclesia must have been got from Latin-speaking monks. With regard to there being no analogy in Teutonic speech for the word Pomona, this was hardly so; for there was a Belgian tribe of Paemanni who might just as conceivably have penetrated to Orkney as their kinsfolk conquered and settled the south of Britain. He thought that the evidence that Hamar meant solely "rock" was not conclusive, as on the Thames we have the names Hammersmith, where Hammers stands for holms, or islands, just as does Ham in East and West Ham below London. The paper opened up a variety of matters for discussion, but its appearance in print must be awaited before full justice could be done to it. —Mr. A. F. Major said that he thought the last speaker in several of his criticisms had missed the lecturer's point. With regard, for instance, to the introduction of ecclesiastical terms from a form of Greek Christianity, the speaker did not understand Mr. McClure to argue that those terms were introduced as a result of any conversion, but merely that Scandinavian and Teutonic tribes, while still heathen, learned those terms from kindred tribes who had been converted. From the fact that the terms were found in Germany, as well as in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Iceland, and in the islands off the Scotch coast, the language must have acquired them long before Christianity was introduced among them; and the lecturer's suggestion seemed very plausible. As to Egilsay in the Orkneys, if named from ecclesia, it in no way conflicted with this theory, as in that case the name of the island must be another Celtic survival, due to the early Irish Christians who preceded the Norsemen in the islands. Again, the lecturer had probably not overlooked the possibility of Teutonic settlement in or influence on Britain in pre-Roman times; but in the absence of any proof of such influence extending as far as Orkney or Shetland, it was fair to assume that the Roman names of the islands were of Celtic origin. The paper had one point of very special interest to members of the Viking Club, which, perhaps, was as new to most present as to the speaker: namely, the revelation of a Scandinavian origin concealed under what seemed at first sight typical Scotch and Irish names. One wondered what limit there was to Scandinavian influence when the clans of the "Mac" stood revealed as Norsemen masquerading in a Celtic dress. It was another warning not to give an opinion on the origin of a word till it had been traced back to the earliest form ascertainable through the various changes it had undergone. Another very important point to which the lecturer had given prominence was the testimony borne by the place-names on our islands and coasts to the seamanship of the Norsemen. It might well form the subject of a separate paper, and in the hands of a scholar such as the lecturer would probably give valuable result. So far as the speaker had read, there was nothing in the Sagas to show that the Norsemen made any endeavour to chart their sailing-courses or discoveries; but there were many proofs that keen observation and vivid description enabled them so to describe a place that after-voyagers could recognise it. Thus Bjorne intending to sail to Greenland, where he had never been, and being storm-driven to the coast of North America, knew from the description he had received that he had not reached his goal; but when he came to Greenland, after making land at many points, he recognised it at once. The best thanks he could give to Mr. McClure for his valuable paper was to hope that he would favour the club on some future occasion. —Dr. Jon Stefansson said it was difficult to attempt criticism, as it was clear that the lecturer had plenty of forces in reserve to reply to any points. Dr. Vigfusson had supported the theory of overpopulation being a main cause of the wave of migration and foreign conquest, which we generalise under the term "Viking age"; but latterly many students have come to the conclusion that the love of the Norseman for the sea and for adventure, as well as the colonising tendencies of the race, were the mainsprings of it. Overpopulation may have been the cause in a few districts, but not everywhere. The conditions of life are very different in the south of Norway and in the narrow, gloomy valleys of the north and west; and the causes are likely to differ in the different localities. Although at first the Norsemen only coasted along the shores, later they struck boldly out to sea, even across the Atlantic. Their seamanship, as shown in the Sagas, needs to be studied far more deeply than it has been; but it wants one who is a seaman as well as a scholar to do it. They seemed, as the lecturer said, to map out the countries they came to, but he knew of no record of anything in the shape of a map or chart among them. In Western Norway they had a country of islands, rocks, and firths, very similar to that which they found on the western coast of Scotland. He was very glad to have had the Celtic side of the subject so well treated in this paper, as it needs one who is both a Celtic and Scandinavian scholar, and who knows the different Celtic dialects, to deal with that phase of it effectively. —Mr. G. M. Atkinson said that with regard to the finding of round skulls in round barrows, as there is considerable variety found in their indices, it can hardly be said to prove that all the round skulls are those of Scandinavians. There is no doubt the Norwegians are a round-headed race—in fact, the roundest known; and, singularly, we find the Esquimaux, opposite to them, the longest headed race on the earth. A pure Scandinavian skull was very difficult to get: the exact type has not yet been settled, but Prof. A. Macalister, at Cambridge, is collecting specimens that will soon enable him to decide the question. Mr. Atkinson had not known of the Huguenot element at Bergen and elsewhere mentioned by Mr. Norris; but such an immigration, while it might affect the modern population, did not touch the general question of racial type, which was founded on remains of undoubted antiquity. He would be glad to know whether the word "Ogam" was a Celtic one. The Ogam stone from Bressay has a Norse inscription in the Ogam character, whatever may be the meaning of the often found inscribed word Mucol, following Maggi, generally interpreted as "son." On the Bressay Stone we have "daughter." Some of the first-noted Ogam inscribed stones were found near the little harbour of Smerwick, in the south of Ireland. Its name implies a Scandinavian settlement. Indeed, it seemed doubtful if Ogam inscriptions were found where there was no possibility of Scandinavian influence, not excepting the Silchester example; and the record of the introduction of this character found in Trinity College Library, Dublin, by the late E. O'Curry seems to confirm it. ("Hither was brought in the sword-sheath of Lochlan's King the Ogam across the sea. It was his own hand that cut it.") An interesting question connected with the paper was the origin of the Irish art found in the Durham Book, the Book of Kells, on the Tara brooch, &c., and its bearing on Scandinavian art. We have little knowledge of its growth. The evidence given in writings is not convincing—nothing comes from nothing. Very interesting, also, is the survival of the early Greek, often mentioned in the Irish Annals; but we have very little of their art, unless we get it through the interlaced strap work common in Roman pavements. The art found on the Borneo shields is very like the Celtic. Perhaps it represents a phase of culture. We are all much indebted to the lecturer for his very instructive paper. —The lecturer, in reply, said that with regard to the evidence of the skulls, he relied on Prof. Rolleston, Canon Greenwell, and others, who were great authorities on the subject. The theory as to round-headed men being found among the Scandinavian peoples is that the Aryan intruders found a round-headed race dwelling in the Scandinavian peninsula when they entered it, and that, though they were conquered by the invaders, they remained among them, and the pre-Aryan type had survived to the present day. The same question as to Britain had been fought out by Profs. Huxley and Freeman. The latter contended that the Saxons drove out or exterminated the earlier inhabitants; but Prof. Huxley had proved that this was only partially true, and that the earlier inhabitants had survived and transmitted their typical characteristics to the present day. In particular, the skull of the Midland navvy, it was contended, was of an earlier type than that of the Saxon invader, probably even pre-Celtic. The Goths he referred to as the Christianised Goths of the empire. They started from the shores of the Baltic, and pushed southward and eastward until they reached the Danube, where they encountered Christianity; then, with a backward sweep, they crossed the whole of Southern Europe, and had got as far as Spain before the Norsemen began to move. In their migration they must have met their pagan kinsfolk—Franks, Saxons, and others—and through them probably such terms as "papa" and "church" found their way into Teutonic speech before the conversion of Scandinavian or Anglo-Saxon. The Norsemen were, with the exception of the Prussians, the last people in Europe to accept Christianity. The name Sabrina was probably Latinised from a Gaelic and not from a Cymric form. In reply to Mr. Atkinson he must point out that in the valley of the Severn Ogam stones occurred and were all associated with purely Gaelic names. They were found also in South-Western England, and one had been discovered at Silchester, probably in the territory of the Belgæ, whom he regarded, in common, he thought, with most antiquaries now, as a Celtic tribe. He was rather surprised to find Mr. Norris still holding the theory of their Teutonic origin. Ogam stones occur which are clearly Christian and belong to the sixth or seventh century, as their inscriptions prove. The word has been derived from Ogmios, the name of a Celtic god, but the whole question is very obscure.

ROYAL SCOTTISH GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY—(Saturday, May 30.)

THE REV. DR. GEORGE SMITH in the chair.—The Rev. William Campbell, of the English Presbyterian Mission, Tainanfu, read a paper on "The Island of Formosa," dealing with its physical geography, inhabitants, products, and history, with special reference to the events of last year. A number of maps, charts, and illustrative objects were also exhibited.—In the discussion which followed, Dr. George Smith, the Rev. James Main, Mr. H. L. Mackenzie, and others took part.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

III.

THERE is no more unequal, yet no more fascinating, artist in the Academy than Mr. J. M. Swan. Let us pass over the two canvases in which he falls short of his own highest standard, and turn to "The Sirens," one of the most charming performances of the year, and essentially that rare thing, a picture painted to satisfy the artist himself, and in a much less degree to compete in a public exhibition with other "pictures of the year." The harmony made by the fair, pallid flesh of the Sirens, the white foam and the shimmering blue of sea and sky, is fresh and beautiful in its reticence; and what is more, the artist succeeds in evoking that true vision of his subject, without which it must inevitably remain a mere academic exercise.

Mr. George Clausen is this year in love with movement for itself—not so much with that which, by Millet and Frederick Walker, was, in its generalised truth, made significant of something beyond that which it actually represents, as with movement pure and simple, appealing to the designer in virtue of its freedom and rhythmic swing. His contributions to the exhibition are, therefore, in each case finished studies rather than pictures in the more popular sense of the word. "Bird-scaring: March" shows with a rare momentariness a red-cheeked young rustic in the very act of shouting to an unseen comrade, as he prepares to spring his ear-torturing rattle and scatter the rooks. "Hoing Wheat" has for its sole motive the measured action, precise and regular yet unelastic, of elderly labourers at work. In "The Hay-barn" and "Boy Threshing" he seeks, with less than absolute success, to suggest the toneless gloom of the barn, pierced here and there by rays and patches of sunlight entering victoriously through the crevices. The eye is at first puzzled—a serious fault in a picture which aims above all at conveying the general visual impression of the thing depicted. The movement of the boy lifting hay in the one canvas, of his fellow threshing in the other, is noted with a rare and subtle truth. A particularly fine passage in the "Boy Threshing" is the back of the youth's head, modelled with the utmost delicacy and caressed by a warm ray of sunlight.

We have delayed somewhat in taking notice of Mr. Orchardson's two canvases, both of which will, on the whole, adequately sustain his high reputation. The genre piece "Reflections" has had many predecessors among the master's works, yet hardly any marked by a higher charm or a higher degree of technical skill. A young lady in the usual Empire costume stands smelling a nosegay of rich roses in the midst of one of those splendid apartments of the same period, which we have come to identify with Mr. Orchardson's art. A subdued note of tender melancholy in the figure is just sufficient to take the study out of the category of mere tours de force. In the furniture and adjuncts the painter as usual revels; foreshortening with the rarest skill the designs on carpet and screen, and playing with a sure hand among all the most delicate gradations of colour—especially running through the whole gamut of yellows, from the red gold of the lady's hair to the sharp citron colour of the Chinese vases. The great full-length portrait "David Stewart, Esq., of Banchory," Lord Provost of Glasgow, belongs to a class of portraits d'apparat necessarily uncommon in English art, and, as a rule, only illustrated during the present reign by the perfunctory presentations of royal personages with which a series of second and third-rate foreigners, acclimatised for the occasion, have favoured the public. This portrait is remarkable for the simplicity, combined with dignity, of its conception, for the richness and appropriateness of the colour—particularly that of the crimson fur-trimmed robe which enwraps the form of the sitter. At the same time there is much in the working out that invites criticism. No single ray falling elsewhere on or near the figure accounts for, or bears out, the concentrated white light which illuminates the head, coming one knows not whence. The sumptuous robe of office might have been disposed in larger and more harmonious folds, instead of being allowed to show without correction the weak points of the tailor or dressmaker answerable for it. Altogether, the execution, though it reveals the hand of the accomplished craftsman, suggests that Mr. Orchardson has been a little hampered and disconcerted by the unusual scale of his canvas.

Although Mr. Gotch's "Alleluia" has been purchased for the Chantry Bequest Gallery—an honour practically equivalent to that of the Médaille du Salon in Paris, which is, again, not to be confounded with the higher distinction of the Médaille d'Honneur—we cannot estimate it as equal to his last year's picture, or, in essentials, an advance on previous efforts. The "Infant Christ," which has, by the way, been rewarded this year with a second class medal by the jury of the Champs Elysées Salon, is at the root of the whole conception, and is, indeed, repeated without much variation in its centre. The charm of Mr. Gotch's execution is its finish, combined with the opposite quality of frankness and breadth; and this the present work shows, like its forerunners from the same brush. But the little singing figures, so variously and garishly clad, form no coherent pictorial whole; and they do not sing, like Van Eyck's angels in the "Adoration of the Lamb," or those marble ones of Luca della Robbia, in the Cantoria of S. Maria del Fiore, but merely open their pretty rosebud mouths.

Mr. Stott of Oldham is never commonplace, even when he is less than convincing. In "Idlers" he presents, on a pale seashore, beyond which stretches a fair blue sea, a group of women in diaphanous draperies, contrasting curiously with their angular attitudes. The bold juxtaposition of the warmer and colder blues recalls the influence of Mr. Whistler, under which this painter grew up. From the sand there are made to spring, in the decorative Japanese fashion, but with less than Japanese consistency, branches of flowering thorn, as little accounted for as they are on an Oriental vase. The clash of the realistic and the idealistic fantastic styles is here too absolute.

Mr. Swinburne's verse, "Golden gifts for all the rest, Sorrow of heart for the king's daughter," admirably describes Mr. Gerald Moira's picture, "The King's Daughter." In the transparent shadow which covers the foreground of the canvas the princess sits moody, and dreaming no happy dreams, while in the red sunset light which heralds evening her companions sport on the green sward with their chosen cavaliers, under the crenelated battlements of the king's castle. The painter shows himself penetrated with the romance of his subject; and this is much indeed, at a time when we are no longer, naturally and without effort, in touch with the romantic element, either in art or literature. Curiously tapestry-like and conventional is the treatment of the background; but this in a picture such as has now been described can hardly be reckoned a fault. An element of the same true romance furnishes an adequate reason for the existence of the large composition "La Belle Dame sans Merci" of Mr. George S. Watson, who has, in a sense, returned to the methods and the standpoint of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, preserving, moreover, some of that genuine naïveté which was one of their finer qualities. As a pendant to this hangs another curious work, revealing high ambition, and a strenuous effort in the direction of romance and a transcendental symbolism. This is "Whither?" by Mr. Byam Shaw. Notwithstanding its startling crudities of colour, its profusion of symbolical adjuncts, having a literary rather than a pictorial significance, the painting fails to impress, or to convince the beholder that its claim to be taken seriously is well founded.

No work in the Academy this year has attracted more attention than Mr. Edwin Abbey's "Richard, Duke of Gloucester and the Lady Anne," taken, it need hardly be said, from the first act of Shakespeare's "Richard III." So brilliant is the canvas from the spectacular and decorative point of view, and so adequately dramatic in its realisation of the scene expressed with an incomparable subtlety in the play, that it would be less than fair to grudge Mr. Abbey his success. The medievalism of the American artist and his manner generally in this new phase of his art suggest a close study of the once famous Antwerp painter, Baron Leys, something of whose flatness and airlessness is, with his better qualities, reproduced. Bold and brilliant is the harmony of crimson and black relieved by the heraldic embroideries of the Lady Anne's mourning robe, and fine the sweep of the onward-moving procession, hardly arrested by the persuasive arguments addressed by the wily prince to its leader. What gives the work a lower rank than has been claimed for it is a certain superficiality, a certain lack of human as distinguished from stage-dramatic force. It is as clever a realisation as could well be devised of a powerful scene in a great play; and this is high praise. Higher—that which belongs to the work of greater breadth and more lasting significance—should not in justice be lavished upon it.

A number of spacious and finely painted landscapes enliven the exhibition, and repose the eye dazzled and disconcerted by the juxtaposition at close quarters of paintings absolutely out of all relation to each other, whether in subject or in pictorial quality.

Finer than anything that he has yet produced, with a stronger infusion of that bracing vigour and national quality of which Constable is the crowning instance, is Mr. J. Aumonier's "In the Fen Country," with its avenue of elms and its far-stretching expanse of level country, broken by converging roads, indicated as a Dutchman might have indicated them. In the foreign mode is Mr. Arnesby Brown's capital twilight landscape, "Homeward," with its now so fashionable effect of tender moonlight combating the rays of departing day. The most remarkable feature in the picture is the group of cows in the foreground, slowly moving away from the spectator towards their night shelter. Mr. B. W. Leader's "A Golden Eve" is a characteristic and, in its peculiar way, not a bad example of a once accepted method of approaching English landscape, happily now so near extinction that its vanishing point is well within view. A fine subject is taken, carefully laid out, and rendered with a certain regard for its obviously picturesque elements; yet with a hard, prosaic insistence such as entirely excludes the higher interpretation of that which in the scene constitutes its essential beauty, whether to the eye or the mind.

The tender, peaceful beauty of home scenery is evidently felt by Mr. G. D. Leslie, whose "September Sunshine" has, moreover, certain decorative qualities, which we should be better able to appreciate did the artist not so completely ignore the atmospheric garment with which, especially in England, nature enwraps even her sunniest scenes.

Almost alone among the landscape painters of the elder generation, Mr. H. W. B. Davis has preserved a certain freshness and emotion in the artistic contact with nature, which lends to all he does a peculiar charm. Notwithstanding the characteristic hardness and opacity of the blue sky, and a too impartial insistence on detail, "An Orchard in Wales" is one of the best landscapes of the year. The cold purity, the virginity of spring are truly felt and admirably given. Delicate in tone and colour, and, as to the main lines of its construction, harmoniously balanced, is Mr. Ernest Waterlow's "In the Mellow Autumn Light."

Mr. Alfred Parsons has of late years produced nothing so fine as his large canvas "The Rain is Over and Gone." Hard and metallic it undoubtedly is in parts, yet much less so than most of his recent works. Rarely has the burst of spring, its onward rush in every tree, every hedge, every blossom, been better expressed. This fine effort gives us hope that Mr. Parsons will at last be able to take his rightful place among English painters of his class.

With Mr. David Murray's four contributions to the Academy we must confess that we feel considerable disappointment. Not that they exactly fall below the more than respectable level of attainment to which he has accustomed his public; but that he makes no further development, no further advance in the direction of self-concentration. He rests content with a various and highly studied, but a coldly intelligent and unemotional, interpretation of what he chooses to see in nature.

Among the marine painters the late Henry Moore, limited as was his art, is sadly missed. Mr. Somerscales has conspicuously failed to fulfil the exaggerated hopes raised by his too enthusiastic admirers; Mr. Brett is as preternaturally painstaking and industrious as ever in the modelling and painting of wave, sky, and rock. One of the most pleasing sea-pieces to be found at Burlington House is Mr. Julius Olsson's "The Golden Isle." Very probably, if we could see it sufficiently well to give a decisive opinion, Mr. Alexander Harrison's "The Great Mirror," with its admirably pure sky flecked here and there with white cloud, would turn out to be the best sea-piece in the exhibition.

CLAUDE PHILLIPS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: a collection of Pre-Raphaelite pictures, formed by the late James Leathart, at the Goupil Gallery; a collection of water-colour drawings and pastels, by Colonel R. Goff—best known hitherto by his etched work—at the Rembrandt Head Gallery; pictures by members of the '91 Art Club, at Clifford's Gallery, Haymarket; pictures and sketches in oils by Miss Linnie Watt, entitled "At Home and Abroad," at Messrs. Henry Graves & Co.'s Galleries; pictures of life scenes in Southern California, by Mr. John Gützon Borglum, at the Hanover Gallery; and a loan collection of coloured Chinese porcelain, at the Burlington Fine Arts Club, in Savile-row.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will hold an exhibition at Clifford's Inn of the drawings and photographs illustrating Mr. Edward A. FitzGerald's forthcoming narrative of his Climbs in the New Zealand Alps. The artists represented are Mr. Joseph Pennell, Mr. H. G. Willink, and Mr. A. D. McCormick. The private view is fixed for Saturday next, and the exhibition will remain open to the public till June 20.

THE twelfth annual exhibition of the Home Arts and Industries Association will be held at the Royal Albert Hall, on June 11 and following days, from 2.30 to 7 p.m. The Princess of Wales and the Duchess of York, who are sending specimens of their work, have promised to visit the exhibition. The exhibits consist of specimens of wood carving, inlay, embossed leather work, pottery, baskets, bookbinding, handspun linen and woollen fabrics, embroidery, &c., the work of the classes affiliated to the association.

THE complete volume of Messrs. Cassell & Co.'s Royal Academy Pictures will be published during the course of next week.

THE following have been elected members of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours: Mr. J. Bernard Partridge, Mr. Arthur Burrington, Mr. E. Davies, Mr. Gordon Browne, Mr. Albert Kinsley, and Miss G. Demain Hammond.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT's famous picture of "The Finding of the Saviour in the Temple" has been presented by Mr. John T. Middlemore to the City Art Gallery at Birmingham, which already possesses several fine examples of the Pre-Raphaelite school.

A MEETING of the Royal Society of Antiquaries of Ireland will be held next week at Omagh, when visits will be paid to places of interest in the neighbourhood, including Clogher, Enniskillen, and Sligo. Papers will also be read on "The Anglo-Normans in Ulster," "The History of County Tyrone," and "Local Place Names."

THE gold medal of honour for painting at the Salon has this year been awarded to M. Benjamin-Constant, who received 231 votes, as compared with 99 votes for M. Harpignies, and 32 for M. Henner. In sculpture, the gold medal fell to M. Gustave Michael; in engraving, to M. Henri Lepoit; in architecture, to M. Scellier de Gisors. Of the fourteen second medals awarded for painting, British artists gained two: Mr. Lorimer for his "Mariage de Convenience"; and Mr. Gotch for his "Infant Jesus." Of thirty-three third medals, British artists gained three; Mr. P. Melton Fisher, for his "Summer Night in Venice"; Mr. G. Harcourt, for his "Thought-Reader"; and Mr. A. S. Cope, for his portrait of Mrs. Mundella. Of the forty-eight artists who received honourable mention, five were American and one English.

To a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Th. Homolle, director of the French School at Athens, sent a description and photographs of a bronze statue discovered in the course of the excavations at Delphi, which—judging from its style, and also from an inscription found close by—he assigned to the year 464 B.C. M. Foucart, on the other hand, observed that the inscription could not possibly be earlier than the very end of the fifth century, and that it had undoubtedly nothing whatever to do with the statue; while M. Clermont-Ganneau expressed his opinion that the subject of the inscription was purely architectural.

THE STAGE. STAGE NOTES.

THE prospects of the theatre for the remainder of the season are somewhat brighter than they have hitherto been. Not only does Miss Nethersole return to us—to-night, instead of last Saturday, as we said erroneously in our last issue—to present her performance of "Carmen"; she will appear for a few nights, before the season closes, in the "Dame aux Camélias" and (and better still) in "Denise." Yet greater news is in store; for, somewhat unexpectedly, we are to welcome the return of Mr. and Mrs. Kendall, who have taken the Garrick for a certain period, and will appear there, within a few days' time, in Mr. Sydney Grundy's "The Greatest of These—". The return of the Kendalls will, indeed, be hailed with satisfaction; and a more distinguished success than any that attended them during their somewhat brief tenure of the Avenue will doubtless reward the exhibition of their admirable art. It is a long time since the completed art of Mrs. Kendal has had the opportunity of being studied in London; and Mr. Sydney Grundy's most recent play—which was first produced at Hull, last September—affords excellent occasion for the perception of the depth and reality, if not indeed of the full range, of Mrs. Kendal's talent.

THE much-esteemed critic who edits the column of notes upon the theatres in every Monday's Daily News has printed this week a letter which he has received from a lady who is an authority on the Dance. The object, or at least one of the objects, of the letter is to protest against the invasion of the theatre by the modern acrobatic dance, of which the very music-halls are—one sometimes thinks—tired; and to remind readers that the best charm of the dance is found not in feats of mere difficulty, but in exercises of grace. We are in great measure in agreement with the writer of this noteworthy and desirable communication. Beauty of line—beauty of line either momentarily arrested or constantly changing—is to be sought for in the dance; and it is no virtue in a dancer to so perform that she may be mistaken for a gymnast. Yet it is fair to recollect—and the fact should not be forgotten by the advocates of leisurely motion—that there have always been two schools, two different ideals if you like, of dancing. They were represented in Voltaire's day by "the Sallé" and "the Camargo": the one typified the school of grace; the other the school of wild agility and impulse—and Voltaire's verse of a hundred and fifty years ago does justice to both. Now the "high-kick"—to which the writer in the Daily News unnecessarily takes exception—is, as we hold, a perfectly legitimate and even enjoyable exhibition of the school of La Camargo, the school of agility. But when going beyond the "high-kick" you get to the ungainly and repulsive attitude known as "the split"—the ugliest attitude almost into which a girl can put herself—and on from the split to strange contortions of the figure—contortions with which beauty has nothing whatever to do—we are at one with the authority who writes in our contemporary. These things are not fit for the Theatre; they cannot possibly amuse or please any one whose taste has a right to be consulted there; and the sometimes charming people who have been led to perform these acrobatic tricks—which are not "art" at all, but only labour misapplied—should be encouraged to disport themselves, and to exhibit their powers, in that which is not the accomplishment of the acrobat, but in that rather which is the veritable dance. At the same time, as we said before, there are the two schools. The merely conventional dance of the Italian ballet is by no means our ideal.

THE date of the promised revival of Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus" is fixed for Thursday evening, July 2, when the performance will be given before members of the Elizabethan Stage Society and their friends at St. George's Hall.

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS, ETC.

M. YSAË gave the first of three concerts at the Queen's Hall on Saturday afternoon, when his programme included Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D and Mendelssohn's in E minor. In the first two movements Beethoven has risen to majestic heights; but an accomplished player may not always be able to follow every feeling and thought of the composer. The other Concerto stands on an exalted, yet lower, plane; and it seems possible for the interpreter to realise to the full all the intentions of its creator. The two, therefore, stand conveniently side by side; and so different are they in character that both can be heard the same afternoon without fatigue. We cannot say that M. YsaË quite satisfied us in the Beethoven movements named above: every now and then he manifested a tendency to linger on certain notes—to paint, as it were, the lily. But he was thoroughly in earnest, and carried his audience with him: there was life, intensity, and intelligence in his playing. The Finale was admirably rendered. The Mendelssohn proved a brilliant success: the tones which he drew from his instrument in the slow movement, were of lovely quality. M.

YsaË is, next to Joachim, the finest interpreter of classical violin music. The orchestra was under the careful direction of Mr. Randegger, who between the two Concertos, gave Grieg's attractive "Peer Gynt" Suite.

R. Strauss' Humoresque "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche" (Op. 28), was played at the second Richter Concert on Monday evening. We noticed this extremely clever work when produced by Mr. Manns at the Crystal Palace. The performance on Monday was very fine, and yet we do not think that it threw the one at the Palace into the shade. On second hearing the cleverness of the workmanship makes a still stronger appeal; also the music, which, apart from the humour which abounds in it, possesses genuine interest. However wild at times the fun may be, the composer keeps fairly within the limits of his art. A Selection from two sections of the "Ring des Nibelungen" was magnificently played; but even Dr. Richter cannot make us forget how much the music loses when given apart from the stage. The concert commenced with Brahms' noble "Tragic" Overture, and concluded with Dvorák's characteristic Symphony "Aus der neuen Welt."

Mr. Eugen d'Albert gave his fourth recital on Tuesday afternoon at St. James's Hall. He commenced with Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 109). His reading of the work displayed intelligence of a high order, and it was free from all exaggeration. We could, however, have wished for tenderer tones, warmer colouring. Then came the Sonata in A flat (Op. 110), and here again there was much to admire. Next to the Waldstein Sonata, which he played, we believe, at the second recital, this proved one of his best Beethoven performances. For all that, we are still of opinion that the pianist is heard to greatest advantage in music in which technical difficulties abound. He gave proof of this in Liszt's Sonata in B minor, which was also included in the programme. This work, which makes heavy demands on the executant, is not often heard. Mr. d'Albert played with surprising mastery, as if he thoroughly enjoyed the music. The Sonata is a curious compound: the opening theme, which plays so important a rôle throughout, is characteristic and bold, and there are melodies full of tender charm and refinement. But the music is unequal, and some passages seem to us to lack distinction. In form the Sonata is peculiar. Liszt's serious attempt to open up new paths, without entirely breaking with the past, commands respect, if not full approval. Mr. d'Albert deserves thanks for his able interpretation of the work of his master and friend. The pianist gave yet another striking exhibition of his skill and strength in Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Handel.

Mr. Mark Hambourg played Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor at the Philharmonic Concert on Wednesday evening. He displayed intelligence, technical skill, and energy quite surprising in one who is yet in his teens. It would be unfair to compare him with some eminent pianists of mature years. We will, however, venture to say that if Mr. Hambourg enjoys health and strength, if he continues to study, and does not develop one gift at the expense of another, he will be able to measure himself with the greatest. The sisters Ravogli were the vocalists. Sofia sang an "Ave Maria" of Cherubini, announced as from "Medea," a juxtaposition of names as curious as it was unsuitable. The singing was jerky, and the intonation far from pure. The vocalist was perhaps indisposed; yet no apology was made. Ginglia sang an air by Thomas, and for an encore "Che Faro": she was not in the best voice, and her singing of the Gluck was somewhat artificial. She was, however, received with enthusiasm. The programme opened with Dr. Mackenzie's "Twelfth Night" Overture, one of the composer's best works: it was given under his direction with much spirit. Saint-Saëns' Symphonic Poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale" followed: it was neatly rendered, but we missed the charm and finesse of the recent performance by the French players. The concert concluded with the "Eroica."

On Wednesday afternoon, at a meeting of the Royal Archaeological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland read an interesting paper on the Virginal Book in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, a book once supposed, but erroneously, to have belonged to Queen Elizabeth. The lecturer, after a few introductory remarks, referred to the growing interest not only in old music, but in performances of it on instruments of the time at which it was written. He gave his illustrations on a fine Italian virginal of the sixteenth century, lent by Mr. A. Dolmetsch. Among these illustrations was a characteristic piece entitled "Rosasolis," by Farnaby. Mr. Maitland might, perhaps, have mentioned that in another old MS. a version, slightly different (we believe), is attributed to Dr. Bull. The lecturer, as one of the editors of the Virginal Book, which is now being published in parts, is, of course, particularly well qualified to describe and discourse on it.

"Dr. Garnett is equally happy in rendering the severe beauties of Dante, the bland, caressing graces of Petrarch, and the passionate impetuosity of the Portuguese."—Scotsman.

MY LITTLE LADY ANNE. By Mrs. Egerton Castle. Tauchnitz Size. (PIERROT'S LIBRARY. Vol. II.) 2s. net.

"The story of the unfortunate 'Little Lady Anne' is told in a manner at once exquisitely natural and full of art; indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a more perfect correspondence between circumstance and style than is presented in this little book."—Liverpool Mercury.

MARCH HARES. By George Forth. Crown 8vo (Lane's Library, Vol. I.), 3s. 6d. net.

"A most absurd and amusing story, whose title is justified by the extravagant actions of all the people in it. It is likely to give uncommon entertainment to those who take Mr. Forth's extravaganzas in the spirit in which it is evidently intended. The book is distinctly a success."—Glasgow Herald.

"A notable and almost unique fantasy of modern life. The story is a strange, delicious mixture of the entirely whimsical and the entirely realistic."—Woman.

THE SACRIFICE of FOOLS: an Indian Novel. By R. Manifold Craig. With Title-Page and Cover Design by Patten Wilson. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"We may confidently assert that few readers who have once begun it will lay it down until the last page is reached. It is written with an agreeable freshness, which is likely to give pleasure to a great number of readers."—Glasgow Herald.

THE LOVE AFFAIRS of a BIBLIOMANIAC. By Eugene Field. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"We have nothing but praise for Mr. Field's book. An indefatigable collector himself, none could better diagnose the disease of bibliomania than he, none could touch its half-pathetic, half-humorous side more lightly or tenderly."—Pall Mall Gazette.

WHERE the ATLANTIC MEETS the LAND. By Caldwell Lipsett. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The 'Forgiveness Sin,' a story of woman's dishonour judged in the fierce light of Irish peasant opinion, is an exceedingly strong piece of work, restrained, dignified, and imaginative."—Skeich.

PLATONIC AFFECTIONS. By John Smith, Author of "Old Brown's Cottages." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"An original and striking story, written in easy and pleasant style. Original since, though there is nothing new in the fact that platonic arrangements never stand the test of time, the inevitable dénouement of the impossible problem that two deliciously honest people try to solve, is worked out so delicately, and with such subtle understanding of human, especially feminine, nature, that the story is really a fascinating as well as an interesting study."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BY RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

RETROSPECTIVE REVIEWS: a Literary Log, 1891-95. 2 vols, crown 8vo, 9s. net.

"Mr. Le Gallienne's two pretty volumes are full of good reading. One might wish that he would attempt some larger flights of criticism on what may be called old-established reputations."—Mr. Andrew Lang in Cosmopolis.

"Suggestive and thoughtful. They go simply and directly to the point, and display no small amount of sound critical judgment."—Spectator.

"Genial and sympathetic, he has much real critical insight, and in going through his volumes we have noted many remarks which were both sound and fine. His style is excellent, clear, lively, and engaging."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Le Gallienne has an exceeding delicacy of perception; he is a man of 'fine antennae,' and whatever may be thought of some of his opinions, he never writes without giving pleasure. One of the most notable qualities of this book is a genuine discrimination. The reader may differ from Mr. Le Gallienne pretty often, but he cannot fail to congratulate himself on having visited many familiar and some unfamiliar authors in very stimulating company."—Illustrated London News.

"These two fascinating volumes confirm his reputation as one of the most brilliant as well as most sagacious of our critics. He possesses the tradition of fine manners in criticism which Matthew Arnold did so much to create. Readers of the 'Literary Log' will turn with fresh interest to every one of the authors of whom Mr. Le Gallienne discourses."—Bookman.

HEGEL'S PHILOSOPHY of RIGHT

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

Mr. Frederic Harrison, in the Daily Chronicle, April 7th, 1896 says:—"Messrs. Bell & Sons are still energetically pursuing their task of adding to and improving the famous series of Bohn's Libraries, which Thomas Carlyle pronounced to be 'the usefullest thing I know.' and... are constantly adding to the Libraries. In the new and certainly pleasanter form, reprints of Standard Works which no gentleman's Library should be without."

NEW VOLUMES.

BURTON'S ANATOMY of MELANCHOLY.

Edited by the Rev. A. R. SHILLETO, M.A. With an Introduction by A. H. BULLEN, Portrait, and Full Index. Three Vols., 3s. 6d. each. Standard Library.

"This edition was first published in Three Vols., Demy 8vo, in 1850, and is now first added to the Libraries. It is for the first time the greater part of the quotations have been verified throughout, and References given where wanting, and the Texts and Notes have been carefully revised."

"Admirers of Burton's 'Anatomy' can hardly hope for a better edition... The work has been edited by the Rev. A. R. Shilleto, who with laborious research, aided by a wide knowledge of classical literature, has traced thousands of quotations to the obscurity of their original hiding-places. Mr. Shilleto has done his difficult work exceedingly well."—Morning Post.

Vols. I. and II. Now Ready. Vol. III. shortly.

Adventures of a Girl. By VIOLET HUNT. A Third Edition. Small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d., cloth; 2s. paper wrapper.

This edition of "The Maiden's Progress" forms Volume V. of Chapman's "Story Series," and appears with considerable modifications and additions.

BOHEMIA: an Historical Sketch. By Count LUTZOW. With Maps. Crown 8vo, 9s.

"Count Lutzow has given us here an admirable historical fragment, as charming as it is valuable, well-informed and strikingly impartial. We have nothing but words of praise for the Count's literary workmanship. His book is a model of all that a book of this kind should be, and his command of clear and vigorous English is unquestionable. It would be well for many native writers who pose and strut on the stage of English literature if they could present their case with half the lucidity and direct simplicity of Count Lutzow." [Full Mail Gazette.]

THE ANNUAL REGISTER:*A Review of Public Events at Home and Abroad for the Year 1895.

*• The first part of this volume (pp. 1-321) is devoted to a résumé of the Political History of England during the year 1895. The events of Parliamentary Life are noted, and the principal speeches summarised. Foreign and Colonial History is dealt with in pp. 222-416. In the second part a Chronological Summary is given of the principal events of the year, both foreign and domestic; this is followed by a Retrospect of Literature, Science, and Art, and an Obituary of Eminent Persons. A full Index is an important feature of the book.

*• Volumes of the ANNUAL REGISTER for the Years 1863-1894 can still be had, price 18s. each.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Readers will find here in a clear and attractive form much information which cannot readily be found anywhere else."

GRANT ALLEN'S SENSATIONAL STORY,
THE JAWS OF DEATH.

12mo, cloth gilt, 2s.; Paper covers, 1s. 6d.

"The Jaws of Death" is a pretty piece of writing in the sensational line. It is cleverly told somewhat on the lines laid down by Poe when he undertook to show how to write a Blackwood tale. We are brought so smoothly, so gradually, to the very edge of the catastrophe the shiver of it is upon us almost before we are there. It is extremely creditable to Mr. Allen's invention."—Daily Chronicle.

"Mr. Knight has produced a varied series of studies, each of which understands the weaving of plot and the invaluable art of sustaining interest. 'The Jaws of Death' is a highly characteristic piece of work and will afford as fascinating a half-hour's reading as any one is likely to get this season."—Publishers' Circular.

land Grey's new novel 'The Power of the Dog.' The book is full of the mysterious workings of the human heart finely true, yet delicate withal."—Star.

"In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly

LITERATURE.

The Tale of Balen. By A. C. Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus.)

IN his Tale of Balen Mr. Swinburne has given to the world his third poem on a British subject, and here, as elsewhere, his extraordinary versatility is seen. The three poems have nothing in common but the British origin of their themes. In Tristram of Lyonesse the poet's flame—I am, for once, right glad of that phrase—became a burning, fiery furnace which was put about two lovers, who, some said, came unscathed out of that fiery ordeal, while others said they took great harm from it. These other persons may still be heard saying: "If you must read of Tristram, read of him in Matthew Arnold." Oddly enough, Matthew Arnold, who must have known what Roger Ascham wrote of Tristram, has made his story the theme of a poem.

Having put fire about the story of Tristram, Mr. Swinburne put ice about that of Locrine. The tragedy which he wrote on this British king, some few years after Tristram of Lyonesse, is as stately and calm and cold a thing as the most admired piece of French drama, made up of gorgeous declamation, varied with line-about dialogue. In the beautiful poem prefixed to this tragedy, Mr. Swinburne implied that the old British myths are inherently thankless themes for poetry. Few will be with him in this matter, who reflect that the literature which he has enriched with three poems on British themes counts among its earlier masterpieces in poetry "Comus," "King Lear," and "Cymbeline," all based on British myths, as in great part is The Fairy Queen, where may be found, told in seven rich stanzas, the story of that British king Locrine and his unloved angry wife, who "first taught men a woman to obey."

Perhaps there is no stronger proof of the inspiring power of British myths than the circumstance that the following fine description of the Round Table is to be found in the writings of a poet of the beginning of this century, whose work is strikingly deficient in the touches dearest prized in poetry:

"There Galaad sat with manly grace,
Yet maiden meekness in his face;
There Morolt of the iron mace,
And love-lorn Tristram there:
And Dinadam with lively glance,
And Lancelot with the fairy lance,
And Mordred with his look askance, Brunor and Bevidere.
Why should I tell of numbers more?
Sir Cay, Sir Banier and Sir Bore,
Sir Carodac the keen,
The gentle Gawain's courteous lore,
Hector de Mares and Pellinore,
And Lancelot, that ever more
Look'd stol'n-wise on the Queen."

He who reads that to the last good line will scarce deny that there was a poet hidden in the postaster who wrote The Bridal of Triormain, that ponderous Scotch joke (is there any who does not know that The Bridal of Triormain was written with the intention that the public should attribute it to Erskine, and that, in the language of its author, "the joke succeeded"?), which was the first Arthurian poem of the century that was to produce such poetry as that which culminates in Mr. Swinburne's noble and beautiful Tale of Balen.

I have said that Mr. Swinburne's three poems on British subjects have nothing in common except their home-origin. Unlike as are Tristram of Lyonesse and Locrine, the difference between these two poems is not greater than that between them and the Tale of Balen. If we look no further than the metres employed, there is a marked unlikeness among the three poems. Tristram of Lyonesse is written in decasyllabic couplets, and pentameter is again the measure of Locrine; but he who would say that Locrine foote it as Tristram of Lyonesse does, would say what was very far from the truth. In The Tale of Balen there is employed throughout a very beautiful nine-lined stanza with much rime-recurrence. The dedication to the poet's mother is in this stanza. It follows here:

"Love that holds life and death in fee,
Deep as the clear unsounded sea
And sweet as life or death can be,
Lays here my hope, my heart and me
Before you, silent, in a song.
Since the old wild tale, made new, found grace,
When half sung through, before your face,
It needs must live a springtide space,
While April suns grow strong."

That a stanza which is almost sonnet-like in its amplexness should lend itself to the framing of those pictures which form a marked feature of all Mr. Swinburne's poetry will readily be imagined. How well it does so may be seen in the case of those four masterpieces in which is described the seasons' difference. As told by Mr. Swinburne, the story of the knight who dealt the dolorous stroke fills one year. It opens in spring and ends in winter. Spring is described in these jubilant words:

"In hawthorn-time the heart grows light,
The world is sweet in sound and sight,
Glad thoughts and birds take flower and flight,
The heather kindles toward the light,
The whin is frankincense and flame.
And be it for strife or be it for love
The falcon quickens as the dove
When earth is touched from heaven above
With joy that knows no name."

The description of summer, full as it is, does not fill a stanza. This is it:

"In linden-time the heart is high
For pride of summer passing by
With lordly laughter in her eye;
A heavy splendour in the sky
Uplifts and bows it down again."

Autumn is dealt with at more length:

"In autumn, when the wind and sea
Rejoice to live and laugh to be,
And scarce the blast that curbs the tree
And bids before it quail and flee
The fiery foliage, where its brand
Is radiant as the seal of spring,
Sounds less delight, and waves a wing
Less lustrous, life's loud thanksgiving Puts life in sea and land."

That asks two readings to get at its full meaning. The full meaning of what follows is clear at once:

"In winter, when the year burns low,
As fire wherein no firebrands glow,
And winds dishevel as they blow
The lovely stormy wings of snow,
The hearts of northern men burn bright
With joy that mocks the joy of spring.
To hear all heaven's keen clarions ring
Music that bids the spirit sing,
And day give thanks for night."

In his version of the story of Balen Mr. Swinburne has followed Malory closely. Those who have not relished Shakspeare the less, but very much the more, after noting how closely he follows Holinshed, will enjoy the comparative study of Mr. Swinburne and Malory. It is perhaps needless to point out to-day that when two persons tell the same story, even when they both tell it well, one tells it better than the other. Holinshed had a high gift for story-telling, but he was to find his overmatch; and the same thing is true of Malory. Take from Mr. Swinburne's Tale of Balen the music to which it is set; take from it the pictures of land and sea and sky; take from it a full dozen psychological passages, and you have left what there is in Malory. It is good and is worth having, even thus stripped of what makes it better and more worth having.

That all that there is in Malory's tale is in Mr. Swinburne's tale shows how faithfully the poet has followed his original. As a matter of fact, Mr. Swinburne's work is, again and again, but deft turning into rime of Malory's. That is the case with lines sounding so "Swinburnian" (as the sapient general reader will say) as these:

"Two bodies and one heart thou hast slain,
Two hearts within one body: aye,
Two souls thou hast lost";

and these:

"Sore grief was mine to see her die,
And for her true faith's sake shall I Love, and with love of heart more high,
All women better till I die."

So piously does the poet follow the old storyteller that we get this setting of Malory's description of a distraught lover—"for pure sorrow his mouth and nose burst out on bleeding"—

"the burning blood
Through lips and nostrils burst afood."

There are pseudo-refined persons who will grimace at this, just as there are tender souls who will start to find Malory's forthright way of describing hand-to-hand fight changed in nothing but in the addition of rime in such passages as the following:

"forth his fleet sword flew,
And clove the head of Garlon through,
Clean to the shoulders."

Most of this kind of thing was "improved away" by the author of the Idylls of the King. The result was to some highly satisfactory; others were of the opinion of that Englishman who saw in the Idylls of the King a "somewhat boudoir epic."

I would not have it understood that Mr. Swinburne slavishly follows Malory. He has made additions to his work; and when he follows the fifteenth century narrator most closely, even in his diction, he alters with fine tact a jarring word. He does more than this. I cannot agree with that writer who has described Malory's work as cast in a mould of pure English hardly second to the English of the Bible; for to my feeling the great beauty which belongs to Malory's work, viewed from the linguistic standpoint, is connected with the circumstance of its being a very exquisite piece of Franco-English. That it should take a beauty from the strong French element in it I can account for only on the ground of its being prose, a form of literary expression in which the French language is indubitably seen at its best. In so far as Mr. Swinburne, as a poet, has concerned himself with the language of Malory, it may be noticed that he has begun, with the right poet's instinct, by turning all that is French in it into English. Thus "Sir Balen le Savage" of Malory becomes with him Balen. The fact that a by-name has been given to the knight is mentioned in the course of the poem; that by-name is given as "The Wild." Such a phrase as, in Malory, "weary of travel," becomes, in Mr. Swinburne, "way-weary." To sum up, the poem is, as the prose-work is not, cast in a mould of pure English.

I wish to make clear what I mean by the additions made by Mr. Swinburne to Malory. Take the case of the following lines:

"And there they laid their dead to sleep
Royally, lying where wild winds keep Keen watch and wait more soft and deep
Than when men's choirs bid music weep
And songlike incense heave and swell."

Those lines are Malory's—to the first comma.

Take, again, this passage from Malory—"Yonder he goeth," said the knight, "he with that black face." In Mr. Swinburne it runs:

"Yonder he goeth against the light,
He with the face as swart as night."

Such a picture as this, "a fair forest in a valley," might seem as good as any to be made. Compare it with this:

"... a sweet,
Green low-lying forest, hushed in heat."

"My name is Balen, called the Wild"—that is Malory Englished. That, with this added,

"Because I ride alone afar
And follow but my soul for star," is Malory's prose enriched with Mr. Swinburne's poetry.

Balen is dying; so is Balen his brother. Balen has just enough life to approach Balen. "Then Balen went on all fours, feet and hands," says Malory. Says Mr. Swinburne:

"Balen rose on hands and knees,
And crawled by childlike dim degrees
Up toward his brother."

I do not give the whole stanza, which is of a haunting loveliness.

What in Roman phrase is called curiosa felicitas was always a feature of Mr. Swinburne's wording. It makes him write in the Tale of Balen of a woman as

"Girt on with raiment strange and rare
That rippled whispering round her."

In the profound sadness of the story of Balen is probably to be found the explanation of the deep melancholy which marks Mr. Swinburne's poem. A phrase which lingers cruelly in the memory is that in which summer is described as the time

"that brings to bloom
All flowers that strew the dead spring's tomb."

The same hopelessness gives their heart of sadness to the three exquisite stanzas which open Book IV. and the stanza which opens Book V. It makes the poet invest his hero with a pensiveness of which there is no trace in Malory's Balen. One Launceor is slain, and Balen looks upon him dead. So Malory.

"... he gazed and stood
And mused in many-minded mood
If life or death were evil or good."

So Mr. Swinburne.

The Balen of Malory declares that, under given conditions, he could find it in him to slay himself. Mr. Swinburne turns this declaration into verse, as thus,

"... even to make a liar of thee
Would I too slay myself, and see How death bids dead men fare."

The words italicised are the thoughtful touch which is added by a poet of whom it has been said that we are not to look for thought in him. What is it, some will ask, but the rich thought in such a phrase as this one which gives its beauty to it—"virgin body and virgin soul."

Those who have charged Mr. Swinburne with using paradox to excess will object to three curious samples of it contained in The Tale of Balen. The hero of the poem is described at the very outset of it as "glad in spirit and sad in soul." He who, reading this, says "Truly Swinburnian!" must be reminded that Chopin, years ago, was so described by one who knew him.

There are other points in the poem that will be touched on. There are persons who, as they flutter the leaves of The Tale of Balen, will say, "Is 'bloat,' correctly speaking, an adjective? Mr. Swinburne writes:

"... the bloat Brute cheek."

Is "curled stair" good for "winding stair"? Should "again" be made to rhyme with "men"?

How answer these persons? One in a hundred among them raises an objection which is worth attention. Such an one is he who will object to the occasional use here, as in most of Mr. Swinburne's work, of what one of his admirers has called "redundant phrases and unfamiliar inversions." That in the case of a poem written in some three hundred long-breathed stanzas there should be here and there a stanza which asks for a second reading is perhaps not wholly surprising. I note four such stanzas in The Tale of Balen. All the rest—this I would emphasise—is poetry so finely touched as to be very clear.

ELSA D'ESTERRE-KERLING.

Social Rights and Duties: Addresses to Ethical Societies. By Leslie Stephen. (Sonnenschein.)

THE recent publication of the Life of Sir J. F. Stephen—the work by which both the writer of the biography and its subject will hereafter be best known in literature—suggests a comparison between the late Judge and his brother, Mr. Leslie Stephen. The latter is far the deeper and subtler thinker of the two, as well as the more persuasive reasoner, while Fitzjames Stephen has greatly the advantage in vigour and picturesqueness of style. But as regards sincerity and independence of mind there is nothing to choose between them: in both it is complete. To this source may be traced a good deal of the humour that enlivens their writings, stronger in the one, and more delicate in the other. To this also may be attributed their common hostility to shams of every kind—whether supported by tradition, or by sentiment, or by the mere craving for novelty. Each has, perhaps, done more in the way of negative criticism than of reconstructive thought; but here, again, there has been a characteristic difference in their polemical style. Fitzjames Stephen wielded a weapon like the broadsword of Richard Coeur de Lion in The Talisman, and struck with as strong an arm, cutting through bars of steel at one blow. Mr. Leslie Stephen's dialectic is like the scimitar of Saladin, that divided a silk veil thrown loosely across its edge.

These volumes touch on many besides ethical topics, and offer more than one example of the writer's easy dexterity in this sort of swordsmanship. Sometimes the razor-edge is given to an argument by a single sentence or a single word, as in the reference to "a book rather quaintly entitled Foundations of Belief" (vol. ii., p. 186). The essay on "Heredity," chiefly devoted to a dissection of Mr. Kidd's fallacies, is an admirable example of this method, although it contains no single trait quite so brilliant as that which does justice on Mr. Arthur Balfour. "Was it not due," Mr. Stephen sweetly asks, "to Greek altruism," as shown at Thermopylae or Marathon, "that Mr. Kidd is not now living under the rule of a Persian satrap?" (vol. ii., p. 38). Again: "'reason,' says Mr. Kidd, 'is the great disintegrating and egoistic force.' I should say that reasoning is essentially altruistic; my discoveries are mentally discoveries for you; I cannot keep a truth for my private consumption" (ib., p. 46). The absurd notion, now so fashionable, that heredity does away with moral responsibility finds itself neatly cut in two by the quiet remark that "if the dependence upon the body be a fatal objection to morality in the higher sense, the circumstance that the body is made upon the plan of previously existing bodies makes no additional difficulties" (ib., p. 17).

On the question of punishment the author feels himself obliged to controvert a view advocated by his brother, to whom he refers, although not by name. The Judge thought that there was a good deal of truth in the vindictive theory. Mr. Stephen sees an element of truth in it also, but he sees it elsewhere; and the distinction is expressed with his usual neatness.

"Successful crime should be regarded with abhorrence. If a man convicted of a grave offence should be allowed to go without punishment, we should be rightly aggrieved. It is not, however, that we should take pleasure in his suffering, but that we should be pained by an example of the practical impunity of anti-social conduct" (vol. ii., p. 93).

The social idea has indeed been a leading inspiration in all Mr. Stephen's philosophic work; and throughout these lectures it is constantly applied to the solution of disputed or difficult questions. For example, in an admirable discussion on "The Sphere of Political Economy" (vol. i., pp. 91-132) the orthodox doctrine is redeemed from the reproach of assuming an abstract "economic man" actuated only by selfish motives; and the true assumption is shown to be that a vast industrial organisation exists, whereby human beings are enabled to satisfy one another's wants by the joint production and exchange of useful commodities. So far from resting on a basis of absolute selfishness, such an organisation could not possibly hold together without a high development of moral feeling. Similarly in the following paper the ideal of competition is shown to be not a selfish struggle on the part of each to secure for himself the largest share of the world's wealth, but an effort to secure for the ablest that part of the world's work which they are best fitted to perform.

It is, perhaps, this great sense of sociality that prevents Mr. Stephen from being a popular writer. He is so conscious of what Mill called "the plurality of causes, and the intermixture of effects," he commands so many points of view, and makes them pass before us with such rapidity, that it becomes difficult to carry off a very distinct impression from his writings beyond the impression of having been very much dazzled and not a little bewildered. He hurries us through so many topics, and at such a pace that when the walk is over we can but give a fragmentary or disjointed account of what has been said or seen by the way. If there is not an economic man there is certainly an economic reader, very careful of his ease and with strictly limited powers of attention. Before Mr. Stephen's ideas can benefit that individual they must be absorbed and reproduced by a class of guides less quick-sighted and nimble-footed, but for that reason more in touch with the average intelligence of even well-educated people. The danger to guard against is that, in undergoing this process, his teaching may lose some of the fine balance and delicate discrimination which is now its characteristic excellence.

ALFRED W. BENN.

Bohemia: An Historical Sketch. By Francis Count Lützow, formerly Deputy for Bohemia in the Austrian Parliament; Member of the Společnost Muses Úsekeho in Prague. (Chapman & Hall.)

THIS is a book which fills a void in our literature, and is in every way worthy of a cordial welcome. It is learned, based upon original authorities, and thoroughly readable. It is, indeed, marvellous that a foreigner should have acquired such a knowledge of our language, for Count Lützow writes English both idiomatically and elegantly. When we come to the matter of his book we see that he has laid all the recognised authorities under contribution, Palacky, Tomek, and Gindely figuring very prominently. The more obscure periods of Bohemian history are merely summarised, and the reader is better able to concentrate himself on the leading characters, such as Premysl Ottakar II., John of Luxemburg, Charles IV., John Hus, Zizka, Prokop the Great, and George Podebrad. Throughout it is the story of a little country, a Slavonic island, endeavouring to preserve its nationality from being engulfed by its German neighbours. For two hundred years—namely, from the battle of the White Mountain, in 1620, till the second decade of the present century—the Bohemian nationality may be said to have disappeared. Never was country doomed to pass through such a period of cruel suffering. With its religious and political institutions destroyed, its aristocracy banished, its language proscribed, the mutilated fragments were still instinct with life, and showed the world how hard it is to eradicate a nation.

All this wonderful revival was brought about by a few patriots whose names will be ever remembered with gratitude by their countrymen. What was begun by such men as Schafarik and Palacky has been carried on in our own days by Náprstek and others. Never were the Bohemians more united and prosperous than at the present time. It has always astonished us that the English, who had so much in common with the Bohemians in old times, should have ordinarily taken so little interest in them. And yet the old Bohemian Constitution, before it was crushed under the iron heel of Ferdinand II. and his myrmidons, presents to us points of the highest interest; and the struggle for religious freedom was fought out splendidly in the campaigns of Zizka, one of the greatest captains the world ever saw. Unfortunately, hardly any Englishmen have taken the trouble to learn the Bohemian language. For their knowledge of the country and people they betake themselves to German books, and here, unhappily, racial animosities are allowed to obscure the truth. We therefore give a hearty greeting to this compact and serviceable book, in which a Bohemian, not a foreigner, tells the story of the country. A year or so ago Mr. James Baker, by his well-written Pictures from Bohemia and his interesting book on Peter Payne, popularised the history and legends of this beautiful land, and told Englishmen of their forgotten countryman who took out to Bohemia the doctrines of Wiclif.

Without overloading us with authorities, Count Lützow gives us many curious references in the footnotes; as, for instance, where he tells us the way in which Pope Paul II. spoke of George Podebrad, the Bohemian king, whom he hated on account of his religious opinions:

"Quomodo es tu bestia audax in praesentia nostra nominare eum regem, quem scis damna-tum haereticum ab ecclesia Romana. Valas ad furcas cum haeretico ribaldo tuo."

Count Lützow does not give any reference to the embassy sent by King George to Louis XI., of which a curious contemporary account has been preserved. This was translated by the late Mr. Wratislaw, who did much for the study of Bohemian history, and to whom we are glad to see that Count Lützow several times refers. The narrative was some time ago printed in its entirety by Prof. Kalousek, to whom we are indebted for the three excellent maps of Bohemia at different periods of her history which are added to Prof. Tomek's work Dějiny Království Českého. That compact book tells the fate of Bohemia from the earliest days till the present time. Count Lützow closes his work with the battle of the White Mountain, the Cheronaea of Bohemia, which gave the death-blow to her independence. There is an excellent book by Prof. Kalousek on the Bohemian Constitution (České Státní Právo), and the subject of the confiscations which took place after the subjugation of the country have been treated at great length by Prof. Bilek.

A chapter at the end of Count Lützow's work gives us a good account of Bohemian literature, which is much richer than the ordinary reader would suppose. Štítný, Hus, and Komenský (Comenius) would, indeed, be considerable writers in any country. Of course, Count Lützow is not able to say anything of modern literature, which lies out of his province, but at the present time the Bohemians can point to many distinguished men among them. May the excellent work of Count Lützow stimulate our countrymen to a more direct study of Bohemian history and life, that they may fully recognise the rights of this interesting people to preserve intact their language and institutions.

W. R. MORFILL.

THE LAST POEMS OF MARGUERITE OF NAVARRE.

Les Dernières Poésies de Marguerite de Navarre. Publiées pour la première fois avec une Introduction et des Notes par Abel Lefranc. (Paris: Armand Colin.)

IT was announced a few months ago that M. Abel Lefranc, Secretary to the College of France, had discovered in the Bibliothèque Nationale a MS. volume of poems by Queen Marguerite of Navarre, which had remained unpublished for nearly three and a half centuries. The collection, regarding whose discovery and history M. Lefranc has already given an account, has at length been given to the world under the auspices of the Société d'Histoire Littéraire. The title of the MS. itself indicated that its contents were the "last works" of the illustrious writer of the Heptameron. Apart from this, however, there is sufficient internal evidence to show, not merely the authenticity of the poems, but that they contain the thoughts of "the pearl of the Valois" during the years immediately preceding her death in 1549. With all the gaiety of spirit which was natural to her, the Queen had had to bear "more than her burden of that weariness common to every well-born creature." In her later years the "Marguerite des Princesses" had been tormented in body and soul "plus que ne peult porter ung cuer de femme." Her last works, therefore, partake largely of the nature of Confessions, and may almost be regarded as the earliest example in this department of literature in the French language. Certainly they cannot be regarded as the least important or interesting, seeing that their author was one of the most enlightened and influential spirits of the French Renaissance, and one of the most remarkable and sympathetic women of any country or time.

The poems which have now been brought to light comprise two Comedies, or rather Pastorals; ten letters in verse, three of which, however, are replies from Jeanne d'Albret, Marguerite's daughter; several lyrical pieces, including songs, dialogues, and elegies; and two longer poems, entitled "Le Navire" and "Les Prisons de la Reine de Navarre." The last-named poem occupies 170 pages, and is the longest of the Queen's works. Although "Les Prisons" has not before been published, another MS. of the work has been known for many years to be in the Bibliothèque Nationale. Its authenticity, however, did not appear sufficiently established to Le Roux de Lincy, although, it is true, he included a fragment of the poem in his edition of the Heptameron. M. Lefranc now holds that, had Le Roux de Lincy but known of the existence of the more recently discovered MS., his doubts must have been set at rest. Whether we have regard to internal or external evidence, it must be admitted that M. Lefranc's case is sufficiently convincing. Only Marguerite could have written a very considerable portion of the "Prisons"; and there is, indeed, less reason to consider it in any degree a joint work than the Heptameron itself.

Contemporary writers have made allusion to certain Pastorals which Marguerite had performed by the ladies and gentlemen of her court at Pau, Nérac, and Mont-de-Marsan; but of these no authentic copies have hitherto been found. The two Comedies contained in the present collection belong to that category. The first, "Comédie sur le Trespas du Roy," was apparently composed shortly after the death of Francis I. at Rambouillet, in 1547; and the grief of Amarissime, the shepherdess, at the loss of Pan, is but the expression of Marguerite's own feelings beneath the blow which deprived her of the brother who had held such a notable place in her affections from her earliest years:

D'abatre ma force et ma tour,
Tout mon refuge et ma defense,
N'as sceu ruyner mon amour
Que je sens crolstre nuict et jour,
Qui ma douleur croist et avance."

The second dramatic piece, "Comédie jouée au Mont de Marsan," is specially interesting, as showing Marguerite's sympathy with the Reformed doctrines, and the mystical pietism in which her peculiar idea of Love was enveloped. The personages are la Mondainne, la Superstitieuse, la Sage, and la Reine de l'Amour de Dieu. It would, perhaps, be difficult to define the purely material and egotistical life more succinctly than in the Confession of Faith, or rather of the want of it, of la Mondainne:

"J'ayme mon corps, demandez moy pourquoy:
Pour ce que beau et plaisant je le voy;
Quant à mon ame qui est dedans cachée,
Je ne la puis toucher d'œil ny de doy,
Ce m'est tout ung, point n'en suis empêchée,
Ame soit ame à qui l'a bien cherchée,
Mon corps est corps, je le sens vivement,
S'il a du mal, j'en suis toute fâchée,
S'il a du bien, j'en ay contentement."

Je le pare et dore,	De le tenir sain,
Acoustre et decore	O'est tout mon desain,
De tous ornemens.	Car je veulx qu'il vive.
Je le painctz et farde,	De melencolie
Remire et regarde	Et de maladie
Voire à tous momens;	Pour luy suis crainctive."

Between la Mondainne and la Superstitieuse, whose chief aim in life is to save her soul by the mortification of the flesh, la Sage, whom we at first take to represent Marguerite, attempts to act as mediator by means of the Reformed doctrines. She has apparently succeeded, when the Queen of Love appears and confounds them all with her glorification of Love as the one thing needful:

"Ces facheux sots qui mesdisent d'aymer,
Et n'en eurent en leur vie cognoissance:
Je vous jure Dieu et ma conscience
Qu'ilz ont grand tort d'un tel plaisir blasmer."

Laissez parler, laissez dire,
Laissez parler qui voudra.
Mesdise qui veult mesdire;
J'aymeray qui m'aymera."

The piece closes leaving the mind uncertain whether the love sung by the Reine de l'Amour is really human or divine—an artifice typical of Marguerite's own ideas on this subject. While, therefore, la Sage may represent the Queen's religious sympathies to a considerable extent, it is clear that the Protestant spirit of the day did not comprise the whole of her philosophy of life.

Among the lyrical pieces in the present collection are to be found some of the most tender and graceful lines, as well as some of the saddest, that have come from Marguerite's pen. While the former are but the expression of that sweetness and charm with which nature had endowed her, the latter, it is to be feared, are but too frequently the record of bitter personal experiences. Notwithstanding her two unfortunate marriages, and the open neglect of Charles of Alençon and Henri d'Albret, Marguerite, unlike that other daughter of the Valois, the Reine Margot of romance, remained faithful to her vows in the midst of a court whose manners were anything but austere. The troubles of her married life were borne by the Queen with unfailing resignation; and if there is one thing that stands out prominently from these last poems, it is the unwavering sense of duty with which she invariably confronted her most bitter trials. Here is a stanza from one of the lighter poems—it is a chanson spirituelle—in which there is no semblance of mental unrest or disillusion:

"O bergere, ma mye,
Je ne vis que d'amours,
Vray amour est ma vie,
Qui d'aymer me convie."

Parquoy je n'ay envie
Que sans cesser l'ayme tousjours.
O bergere, ma mye,
Je ne vis que d'amours."

Here, in another, is a different and, no doubt, a personal note:

"Vous m'aviez dict que vous m'aymiez bien fort,
Bien fort, bien fort, et ainzy je l'ay creu,
Mais tost après vous felates vostre effort
D'en dire autant en un lieu que j'ay veu:
Bien fort, bien fort, vous l'aymés, je l'ay sceu."

"Les Adieux" is another remarkable poem in a similar strain. It is the poignant expression of disappointed, or rather outraged, love; and in every one of the twenty-one stanzas there is a regretful farewell to something at one time tenderly associated with the object of a now dead or dying passion:

"Adieu lettres, epistres et dizains,
Rondeaux, complectz, qui m'ont si bien servie,
Dont le revoir et relire je crainctz,
Qui à aymer encores me convie.
Adieu tout ce de quoy j'ay eu envie
D'user, pensant par cela mieulx vous plaire.
Adieu tout l'heur et la fin de ma vie,
Car l'importable ennuy me contrainct taire."

"Adieu l'adieu que tant de foye me distes,
Quand loing de moy vous en falloist aller,
La loyauté que garder me promistez,
Les promesses qu'eussiez bien deu celer,
Puisque je vois faintise reveller
Vostre vouloir et peu caché secret.
Adieu l'adieu souvent dit sans parler,
Dont la memoire augmente le regret."

"Les Prisons," besides being the longest of Marguerite of Navarre's works, is certainly one of the most important, inasmuch as it appears to form a synthesis of the whole intellectual and moral life of the author of the Heptameron. The selection of the title as a symbol of the mental trials to which she had been subjected seems eminently natural. Her grandfather, Charles Duke of Orleans, the poet, had suffered captivity for twenty-five years in England; her brother, Francis I., and her husband, Henri d'Albret, had both been in Spanish prisons; and many of her favourite protégés, such as Clément Marot, Gérard Roussel and others, had undergone a like experience in France. The captivity of Francis, following upon his defeat at Pavia, particularly affected his sister; and the incident may be said to have been one of the crises in Marguerite's life. As she herself had been spared any direct experience of a material prison, she seems to have deemed it all the more fitting to make use of this analogy in portraying the troubles of her own inner life. "Les Prisons" shows in form, as well as in other respects, the influence of Dante, to whom Marguerite makes more than one allusion in other works. Throughout the poem the writer appears as a man—and that for obvious reasons—but the circumstantial accounts, towards the close, of the death of Marguerite of Lorraine, the Queen's mother-in-law, of Charles of Alençon, her first husband, and of Francis I., her brother, remove any possible doubt regarding the authorship. The work shows in allegorical form the principal stages in Marguerite's life, and the succession of moral prisons in which she was confined before obtaining her final emancipation in the Divine love. The prisons are three: Love, Worldly Ambition, and Human Knowledge; and the manner in which the analogy between these and physical duress is constituted makes this poem one of the most curious productions of the age in which it was written. A glimpse of the Queen's method may be obtained from a passage in the first "prison," where the writer is represented as languishing under the thralldom of the "amye tant aymée":

"Ne vous ouvrez, fenestre, pour le jour,
Car j'ay icy la lumiere d'amour,
Par qui je voy le bien qui me fait vivre,
Dont je voudrois jamais n'estre delivre."

The ambition represented by the second "prison" is to be realised by the acquirement of such knowledge as will gain the ear of princes, one of the chief requisites at that time being to speak all languages well, "affin de faire en tous pays harangues":

"Je parleray myeux que tous si je puy:
Les livres j'ay qui sont la porte et l'huy
Par où l'on va à l'honneur de science,
Repoz n'auray, ny paix, ny passience,
Qu'à bien parler ne soye parvenu,
[Moy] qui à sçavoir toute chose est tenu."

The final stage of captivity, however, is the most curious. The pillars supporting the Prison of Knowledge are constructed by the captive of books, relating to every department of knowledge—poetry, law, medicine, mathematics, history, rhetoric—and may be taken to represent an encyclopaedia of the sixteenth century. But without the Divine light all the learning of the Renaissance proves but so many intellectual bonds, and it is only when it penetrates into the prison that the state indicated in Marguerite's favourite device, "Ubi spiritus, ibi libertas," is attained:

"D'autre part, viz tumber mes livres beaulx,
Où sont comprins les sept artz liberaulx;
Ce feu les a de tresbuscher hastez,
Mais toutesfoys ne les a pas gastez,
Car j'apperceuz que leur beaulté premiere
Orisoit tant plus recevoit de lumiere."

The final poem, "Le Navire," derives its title from the first line, where Marguerite compares herself with a ship "stranded far from her true port." It also is written after the death of Francis I., and consists largely of dialogues between brother and sister regarding the purpose of human life. At times Francis remonstrates with his sister because of her excessive grief at his loss, previous to which, Marguerite writes, her life had been "pleine de sucre et miel." In this poem we find incidentally what appears to be a direct allusion, in connexion with the battle of Pavia, to the historic phrase, "Tout est perdu fors l'honneur," attributed to Francis with reference to his defeat. The most curious feature of the poem, however, is the part which Marguerite apportions her brother. Francis, strangely enough, is made to counsel the diligent study of the Scriptures and to defend the doctrines of the Reformers:

"Margueritte, et pourquoy n'as tu trouvé,
La margueritte et perle evangelique,
Que l'Escripture a si fort aprouvée."

Although Marguerite had encouraged and protected the professors of the Reformed religion, political considerations had latterly compelled Francis to persecute the Vaudois and other Protestant sects, and even she was unable to save certain of her favourites from persecution and the stake. The Queen, therefore, may have presented the perfections of her brother in somewhat too brilliant colours, but the fault is one not far removed from virtue in a sister. Marguerite herself, in these "last works," must excite our greater sympathy and admiration as a woman, while as an influence on the literary and intellectual spirit of her time she presents claims to even a higher place than history has already accorded her.

A Cumberland Tragedy. By Percy Russell. (Mentz Kenner.)

THE Canadian poet and prose-writer, Prof. Charles G. D. Roberts, is not as widely known in this country as he deserves to be: his work is strong, individual, and distinctive. In the present volume of short stories—some of which have appeared in Harper's, Lippincott's, and Longman's magazines—the author discloses an especially interesting phase of his art, one, moreover, wherein he has acquired great mastery. The title, Earth's Enigmas, indicates the nature of most of the tales, although it does not apply to grim imaginings such as "A Tragedy of the Tide," or to faithful studies of rough-hewn backwood characters such as are drawn in "The Romance of an Ox-team." Prof. Roberts plays upon many chords of emotion; he kindles the imagination in a variety of ways; and so carefully wrought is each presentment, so artistically winnowed in each case is the essential from the unessential, that a difficulty exists in pointing to what is most noteworthy in the volume. Three studies of animal nature stand out for their elemental strength. The first story, in which two hungry panthers meet their death when they thought to make a well-earned meal upon the tender flesh of a young girl, is distinguished by a poet's sympathetic insight, which enables him to penetrate through surface differences to the primitive love of offspring that man shares with the animal creation; "Strayed" and "The Young Ravens that Call upon Him" treat of the same problem of eternal strife from other points of view. The author writes with reserve, with knowledge, and with concentrated force. In the main his language is so eminently appropriate that the few infelicities—such as "along beside" and "over across"—jar all the more upon the reader; here and there, too, the defects of a poet's prose are present, as, for example, in the exaggerated use of words such as "tireless," "moveless," "tideless," and "viewless"; but these blemishes serve only to emphasise the fine quality of the work as a whole.

The reader of Mrs. Anna C. Steele's new novel may hazard safely that she is an accomplished horsewoman, that she knows the joy of a mad gallop over springy, green turf, and has experienced the pleasure of a cross-country ride on a spirited animal. There are a number of fences in Lesbia, which, for the most part, the author takes in gallant style, although occasionally she pulls up at an awkward moment, thus causing the rider to be thrown forcibly forwards. After surveying the final obstacle for a long time, however, Mrs. Steele turns aside and slips through a convenient gap in a hedge hard by. The book contains several good situations, notably that of little Lesbia's experience when mounted on the bay thoroughbred, Sir Bevis. The scene is laid in Sussex: we are conscious of the broad, wind-swept expanses of the Downs, and the atmosphere throughout is breezy and vigorous. A clever contrast is made between the staunch, persevering hero, Kenneth Ross, and Lesbia, the irresponsible daughter of a dancing mistress; but, as has been hinted, the dénouement is unsatisfactory. Never do "gorse and gossamer foregather" thus. A breath of north wind, a clouded sky, and the Lesbias in life repeat their experiments with the thoughtless Lord Ulicks.

Sir Nicolas Steele, Bart., was an Irishman and a rogue—a genuine, consistent rogue, without a trace of those inconvenient scruples which cause the villain to pause ere he commits a crime that is worth the telling. A spendthrift with a heart aflame, a pleasure-lover with an eye for a beautiful woman and an educated taste in wines, Sir Nicholas regarded the whole world as his peculiar hunting-ground, its treasures, although for the moment distributed, as belonging rightfully to himself. He was a gentlemanly, rollicking rascal withal, who would not have injured a fellow-creature—unless, indeed, that fellow-creature chanced to obstruct any of his schemes, and then he was as unmoral as a whirling bullet. The world would know nothing of this brave gentleman had not his valet, the faithful Hildebrand Bigg, possessed at once an observant nature and a graphic pen. Bigg was a kindred soul to whom his master confided all his projects, save when a woman was in question, and then the Irish baronet was silent and inscrutable. The adventures of these two worthies, swashbucklers both, are told by Bigg in a fashion that does infinite credit to his intelligence and to the training of his pastors and masters in early life. Although, for all we know, Sir Nicolas is still quartered in the remote Russian village, and his companion still lives at his ease in America, the style adopted in the narrative is that of a century ago; this, however, does but add piquancy and charm to the thorough-going, and, if the word may be allowed in this connexion, straightforward villainies here disclosed. The passing of the great white diamond is one of the best things in A Gentleman's Gentleman—a vastly entertaining book, upon which Mr. Max Pemberton is to be congratulated.

At his best, Mr. Neil Munro is a writer of whom account must be taken. He has been widely hailed as a foremost interpreter of the Gaelic sentiment and the Gaelic character; and when he is articulate, as in some of the tales in The Lost Pibroch, there is no doubt that he does interpret. For example, in "Black Murdo," a clear, strong, and penetrating note is struck: a note blent of vibrations essentially Celtic, of a quality akin with the lochs, the mountains, and the drifting cloud-effects of the remote Highlands. Here the author discloses skilfully that deep, persistent hatred which in old times divided clan from clan, and even families of the same clan, as surely as if a wide, bottomless chasm separated their hamlets: a hatred not only true in itself, but a typical sentiment from which spring a thousand otherwise inexplicable traits of the modern Gael. The actors in the grim tragedy are deftly detached and ably re-grouped. Black Murdo, of Cladichside, year after year, though it was hard to keep the thirsty blade sheathed, repressed his fierce hatred for Diarmed the Red; finally, when old age had intensified the unappeased desire into a dominant passion, his laugh was a laugh of satisfied joy as he shouted to his dead woman's son, Rory the Red, "White love, give him it"; and his eyes were aflame as he watched the youth plunge a dirk into the heart of his own father. Unfortunately, the high-level achieved in this, and one or two other stories, is not maintained. Almost without exception, the material is good; but frequently it is not shaped into a forceful, homogeneous whole. The attempt to find English equivalents for Gaelic phrases has resulted in a number of sentences wherein the meaning is obscure, and the intended rhythm entirely absent. The following quotation will show how unequal and unnecessarily strained is the style in places:

"Up grew the trees, fast and tall, and shut the little folks in so that the way out they could not get if they had the mind for it. But never an out they wished for. They grew with the firs and alders, a quiet clan in the heart of the big wood, clear of the world out-by."

On almost every page there are phrases that offend, by reason of inverted structure, undue bending of English words, or straining after effect. But, when all is said, the faults in The Lost Pibroch are of a kind which reserve and a constant heed to the appropriate use of words will cause to disappear; and the book is to be cordially welcomed as an addition to the literature of the Gael, that is being so much discussed at present.

As has frequently been observed, the province of criticism is to give praise intelligently, quite as much as to call attention to ineptitudes or weaknesses; moreover, it is obviously unfair to apply the same test to every work of fiction. Mr. Clark Russell has written many stirring books, and in The Tale of Ten he gives us another eminently readable story of the kind with which his name is associated. If the plot bear signs of mechanical construction, if the incidents are introduced somewhat arbitrarily, this will not detract from the popularity of the work. Plunder was the object of the ten broken-down gentlemen who embarked as passengers on board Captain Benson's good ship Queen; as the gang, however, did not get to work in earnest until well on in the second volume, the length of the story might have been reduced with advantage. The author, who once more exhibits his intimate knowledge of nautical affairs, tells of horrors and hairbreadth escapes with his customary skill. Margaret Mansel is the heroine whose charms are responsible for the death of one of the ten, for the heavy, if not broken, heart of gallant Capt. Congreve, and for the final happiness of Commander Boldock.

It says much for the power of the Italian novelist Antonio Fogazzaro that even in translation he can hold the attention of the reader throughout 550 closely printed pages. The heroine, Malombra, whose name supplies the title of the work, had "a black heart, a glowing imagination, and an intellect shaken, but not overturned." For the most part, the book consists of a masterly study of her strange nature, and of that of Silla, whom she believes to have met on earth in a former existence. It is a remarkable analysis, wherein each incident is made to enhance the general effect. Mr. F. Thorold Dickson has translated Malombra with understanding and sympathy.

The time has come when the problem of sex, if it be taken as the central interest in a book, must be treated by a master in a masterly way. We have had enough, and more than enough, for the present at any rate, of ineffective attempts to deal with the subject. There is much dash and vigour displayed in A Bride's Experiment; but the book would have been more acceptable, if Messrs. Mansford and Inglebright had not dwelt so long and so laboriously on the heroine's views regarding the native lubras and piccaninnies of Australia. The characters, notably that of Sandy, the misogynist, are overdrawn; the construction is faulty and often inconsequent; but despite these shortcomings, the story is one of average merit.

The hero and heroine of Mr. John Smith's novel make the curious experiment of going through the marriage service, not for the reasons set forth in the Prayer Book, but solely in order that they may, without raising the ire of estimable Mrs. Grundy, live together as comrades who have many interests in common, but between whom no bond of love exists. Some persons, doubtless, will dismiss the book with the word "impossible," but that adjective cannot be employed too cautiously; moreover, in the present instance the author is so pleasantly persuasive in all he writes, that, for the time at any rate, the question of possibility or probability does not obtrude itself. The reader will not feel inclined to quarrel with Mr. Smith for the light and breezy way in which he deals with the problem; therein lies much of the charm of Platonic Affections. Delightfully drawn as is the character of Parson Passmore, it must be said that he, and the incidents with which he is connected, are given undue prominence, and this detracts from the unity of the narrative. By the way, is Mrs. Whitstable intended to quote or to misquote Browning? In any case, no improvement has been made upon the poet's second line as given on p. 29:

"The little more—and how much it is!
The little less—and what miles away!"

The story, issued in the "Keynotes" series, is well worth reading.

A Village Drama is aptly named. The characters are essentially provincial, the horizon limited to the view obtained from Spriggs—a backwood village in California. The sense of remoteness is well maintained, and throughout there is evidence of a painstaking attempt to catch and faithfully interpret the outwardly uneventful life in that Far Western settlement. Many passages give a sense of verisimilitude. It is in the power to select and emphasise that V. Schallenger is weak. The material requires to be sifted and remoulded, the important incidents to be thrown into bolder relief. The motif of the book bears some resemblance to that of La Jambette de Kors Davis, a short story of rare power by the Belgian writer, George Eekhoud.

Mrs. Hartley Perks's second story is on much the same lines as its predecessor. Readers of fiction are familiar with the types of character who figure in the pages of Among the Bracken, and the slender plot—except for the final incident, which conflicts with all that has gone before—is destitute of noteworthy features. Nevertheless, the simple, direct method of narration, the healthy atmosphere, and the faithful, if not very profound, study of life in the quiet village of Dalloch, give to the volume a certain charm. The Scottish dialect is sparingly employed, but it is introduced with such monotonous regularity that it almost seems as if the author had set apart every tenth page for Laban's dry witticisms or Bobbie Girran's sallies of youthful humour. John Hasteltine, too, would gain in consistency and in dignity were he shorn of some of his superabundant sentimentality.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Percy Russell did not revise the proofs of A Cumberland Tragedy with greater care. The book is full of redundancies, repetitions, misplaced parts of speech, and clumsy sentences. If for no other reason, the task of perusal would be irksome. Moreover, this story of a wife's ordeal, as it is called, is so crude in conception, so lamentably lacking in cohesion and design, that it must fail to satisfy the least exigent of novel readers.

The author is evidently sincere, and it may be that strenuous effort and patient care will enable him at some future date to produce a good story. FRANK RINDER.

TWO BOOKS ON ITALY.

Italien, Ansichten und Streiflichter. Von Victor Hehn, Fünfte Auflage. (Berlin: Bornkräger.) The late Victor Hehn's collected essays on Italy are here preceded by a short account of the author. Although Hehn's life was not adventurous, and met with no more stirring incident than an undeserved imprisonment at St. Petersburg, yet the biography is an interesting one, and it bears throughout the impress of the strong personality of its hero. Clear-sighted, and strong in his likes and dislikes, Hehn was a good friend and a good hater. The Italian nation may well be grateful to him for his Pro Populo Italico: no indiscriminating piece of praise, but a judicious reminder of the many good qualities of the Italians, accompanied by a frank admission of what points of their character require amendment. Of the Sicilian (or West Sicilian) character he speaks with most severity and least hopefulness. His curious antipathy to the English shall not provoke us to be unjust to his memory. Not a novelist or a writer on popular topics, Hehn was, of course, not widely known in England; but we never heard anyone who was acquainted with his work speak lightly of it, and we have no inclination to begin. The strong points which made their mark in his Kulturpflanzen und Haustierte are traceable in the small-scale studies which make up this volume: the papers on Rome, Sicily, the Low Ground, the Rocky Ground, Landscape, the Animals, and others. The author had a sharp eye for noting and a picturesque pen for reproducing the things which most strike a German who crosses the Alps and Apennines. He sets before us surely and vividly the colour, the soil, the architecture, &c., the cultivation of the peninsula. His own reading and training were such that he seldom fails to explain as well as describe. He must have been one of the earliest of the nature-observers to feel the essentially modern desire to explain as he goes along even the minor features and the smaller generalisations. Truth of description and depth of examination strike his reader all through the book. Yet it is not too serious. The naturalist's fancy pleases itself with the thought of what good results might follow if ten thousand fair-haired girls could be shipped from the Weser and the Elbe to Apulia, while a like number of dark-skinned beauties from the South were given as brides to the honest peasants of Hanover and Mecklenburg. Some of Hehn's Latin quotations are happy enough, but they are not always carefully printed.

The Country of Horace and Virgil. By Gaston Boissier. Translated by D. H. Fisher. (Fisher Unwin.) We are glad to see, under the above title, a translation of the Nouvelles Promenades Archéologiques. M. Gaston Boissier is one of the most skilled of popularisers and one of the most enjoyable of guides. No one who travels with him runs any risk of losing his time. Light, lucid, and up to date, M. Boissier's essays make travel interesting and scholarship entertaining. He knows the great secret of not lingering too long on one topic; and he keeps alive the reader's interest, by cunningly drawing in all the subsidiary points, all the "literary epithets," all the scholarly reminiscences which can enrich the main thing at which he bids us look. His "Aeneas in Sicily" does not rely only on the adventures of that hero, but brings to memory also the fields or sea-cliffs of Theocritus and the happy hunting-grounds of Virgil. We have often had occasion to admire the art and learning of M. Boissier, and hope for many more occasions of admiring them; but we do wish him a better translator than Mr. Fisher. It is not that Mr. Fisher does not understand French (though at p. 70 he has turned une voûte of the Cucumella into "two domes"), but he does not understand his author's subjects with any sort of accuracy. The same kind of mistakes which disfigured his Rome and Pompeii may be found—and perhaps more numerous—in the present volume. "The monks of M. Thomasi Crudeli" (for "works") must be a misprint; but "Acestus" for "Acestes" occurs more than once, and no ordinary misprint could turn "The Doric order" into "The Gothic order," or bring Livius Andronicus to Rome in 514 B.C. Nor can we well forgive the forms "Mons Lucretalis," "Polydoles," and "Scalager." It would have been so easy to have the sheets of the translation revised by a competent person.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. JOHN MURRAY's forthcoming edition of Byron's Works in Prose and Verse will be edited by Byron's grandson, the Earl of Lovelace. In addition to the new material collected for many years by Mr. Murray, the edition will contain unpublished MSS. and letters contributed by the editor from Lord Byron's correspondence with Lady Byron and other persons.

MR. GLADSTONE's new volume of Studies Subsidiary to the Works of Bishop Butler will be published at the Clarendon Press early in July. Part I. will consist of eleven chapters on Butler himself. The substance of one of these, a reply to the Bishop's censors, appeared in the Nineteenth Century, and most of another chapter, that treating of Butler's celebrity and influence, was published in Good Words; but each of these has now been revised and supplemented by Mr. Gladstone. Part II., consisting of ten chapters, is devoted to such subsidiary studies as "Discussion of a Future Life," "Necessity or Determinism," "Teleology," "Miracle the Mediation of Christ," and "Probability as the Guide of Life"; and of these only part of the first has appeared in the North American Review. The volume will be published simultaneously in this country and in America.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish in a few days a History of the Portuguese in South Africa, by Dr. G. M. Theal, to whom we already owe so many valuable works on that portion of the globe. Beginning with an account of the Bushmen and Hottentots, the aborigines of the wide tract that lies between the Cape and the Zambesi, he traces in detail that romantic record of discovery and colonisation by the Portuguese which began early in the fifteenth century, but has left so little at the present day. Besides maps, the volume will contain an exhaustive list of authorities and an index.

MR. JOHN LANE announces for publication a complete bibliography of fencing and duelling, as practised by all European nations from the middle ages to the present day, by Capt. Carl A. Thimm. This is intended to be a standard work of reference, brought down to date, with a classified index, arranged in chronological order, of books, &c., on the subjects dealt with, published or in MS., in all European languages and in all countries. All memorable duels from 1712 to 1892 have been carefully noted in chronological order, as well as the accounts of duels which have appeared in the Times from 1831 to 1895.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD's story, "The Wizard," after running serially in the African Review, will be published in England as "Arrowsmith's Christmas Annual," and in America in book form by Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. The tale deals with the conversion of a savage tribe in Africa by a missionary, who takes his stand upon a literal interpretation of the New Testament promises.

MR. REGINALD F. STATHAM is about to issue with Mr. T. Fisher Unwin a story of adventure in a British colony, entitled Mr. Magnus. It is in part the character-sketch of an autocrat of commerce, the director of some ruby mines which penetrate more deeply than any others into the bowels of the earth.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN is about to issue, as the fourth volume in his series of "Little Novels," Margaret Grey, by Mr. H. Barton Baker. The story deals with the poverty and poetry of those who live without "visible means of subsistence."

MR. BERNARD QUARITCH will publish, in the course of the present season, a new and revised edition of A History of Gardening in England, by the Hon. Alicia Amherst, with 67 illustrations of old English gardens. The first edition, issued last winter, was sold out within two months.

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co. are about to publish a cheap edition of Conversations with Carlyle, by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, who has written a new preface, embodying the opinions of Mr. Lecky and Sir Walter Besant.

A SECOND edition has already been called for of Major Sharp Hume's book on The Courtships of Queen Elizabeth, which was only published a few weeks ago.

THERE has just been issued to members of the Harleian Society the fourth and concluding volume of Hunter's Pedigrees and Memoranda, edited, from the MS. in the British Museum, by Mr. J. W. Clay, who has added notes and an index. The four volumes together fill 1454 pages.

AT a meeting of authors and journalists recently held at the office of the New Age, Temple House, E.C., it was unanimously resolved to pay a fitting tribute to the memory of the late James Ashcroft Noble by raising a memorial fund. The following gentlemen consented to serve on the committee of the fund: Messrs. Grant Allen, F. A. Atkins, Mackenzie Bell, William Canton, Hall Caine, William Clarke, Prof. Dowden, Dr. Conan Doyle, A. E. Fletcher, R. H. Hutton, Lionel Johnson, Coulson Kernahan, R. Le Gallienne, Gerald Massey, H. W. Massingham, A. H. Miles, Henry Norman, Sir Edward Russell, and William Watson. Contributions to the fund will be gladly received by the hon. treasurer, Mr. A. E. Fletcher, 7 De Crespigny-park, Denmark-hill, S.E.

THE annual meeting of the National Indian Association, in aid of education and social progress, will be held at the Imperial Institute on Thursday next, at 4 p.m., when Mr. H. A. Acworth will read a paper entitled "Reminiscences of Western India." Sir Alexander Miller (late legal member of council) will be in the chair; and among those who have promised to address the meeting are Sir William Markby, Mrs. Steel, and Mr. Bhowanaggee.

ON Thursday next, Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale—which will last altogether for six days—of a collection of books and MSS. brought together from several different sources. Here may be found things to suit all tastes, if not all purses. Among the books proper, we may mention the largest known copy of the Nuremberg Chronicle, the first edition of the Canterbury Tales that was printed by Caxton, the second, third, and fourth Folios of Shakespeare, Milton's Lycidas (1638), Elliot's American Bible, the Kilmarnock Burns, a number of presentation copies from the library of Wordsworth, a series of Gould's "Birds," and the rarest opuscula of Thackeray and Dickens. The MSS. fall into two classes. On the one hand, we have illuminated Horae of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; on the other hand, such modern documents as the juvenile stories of Charlotte Brontë, and letters of Burns and Southey. Of special interest are—a pane of glass on which Carlyle wrote when a student at Edinburgh; a lock of Napoleon's hair cut off on board the Bellerophon; a series of large pen and ink drawings by Thackeray, extracted from an album formerly the property of Mrs. Robert Bell; and a set of illustrations to Harrison Ainsworth's works, by Cruikshank and Phiz, which have been in the possession of the novelist's daughter.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE following are the arrangements for the celebration next week of Lord Kelvin's jubilee as professor of natural philosophy at Glasgow. On Monday evening the university will give a conversazione, at which there is to be a special exhibition of Lord Kelvin's many inventions. On Tuesday morning addresses will be presented to Lord Kelvin by delegates from British, colonial, and foreign universities, and from other learned bodies of which he is a member; and in the evening a banquet will be given to him by the corporation of Glasgow. On Wednesday the senate of the university will invite the visitors to sail down the Clyde. It is expected that about fifty distinguished visitors from Europe, America, and the colonies will be present, in addition to 150 from the United Kingdom.

THE University of Cambridge proposes to confer honorary degrees upon the following distinguished foreigners: LL.D., T. M. C. Asser, professor of international law at Amsterdam; Prof. Felix Liebermann, Doctor in Letters.—Samuel Berger, secretary of the faculty of Protestant theology at Paris; Louis Duchesne, director of the Ecole Française de Rome; Michiel Johannes De Goeje, professor of Arabic and Turkish at Leyden; Adolph Harnack, professor of theology at Berlin; Francis Andrew March, professor of the English language and comparative philology in Lafayette College, U.S.; Theodor Zahn, professor of theology at Erlangen. Doctor in Science.—Carl Gegenbaur, professor of anatomy and director of the Anatomical Institute, Heidelberg; Felix Klein, professor of mathematics at Göttingen; Simon Newcomb, professor of mathematics and astronomy in the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, and superintendent of the American Nautical Almanac.

THE name of Prof. March, of Lafayette, has also to be added to the list of those upon whom an honorary degree will be conferred at the Oxford Commemoration.

DR. MANDEL CREIGHTON, Bishop of Peterborough, will deliver the fifth Romanes Lecture at Oxford on Wednesday next, in the Sheldonian Theatre, his subject being "English National Character."

MR. H. E. WOOLDRIDGE, Slade professor of fine art at Oxford, proposes to deliver three lectures next week, concluding his course on "The Art of Painting."

PROF. SAYCE will deliver a public lecture at Oxford on Thursday next, in the hall of Queen's College, upon "Babylonia in the Age of Abraham, according to Recent Discoveries."

MR. J. BASS MULLINGER, of St. John's, university reader in history, has been elected president of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, in succession to Mr. W. M. Fawcett.

THE court of governors of Victoria University has resolved to institute an honours school of modern languages and literatures.

AT University College, London, Mr. Ernest Gardner, recently director of the British School at Athens, has been elected to the Yates chair of archaeology, which has been vacant since the death of Reginald Stuart Poole; and Dr. E. Denison Ross has been appointed to the chair of Persian formerly held (jointly with the chair of Arabic) by Prof. Rieu, now at Cambridge.

THE University of Toronto has conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon Mr. Goldwin Smith, in consequence of which a member of the senate, Judge Falconbridge, has thought it his duty to resign.

ANTIQUARIES and those interested in charters will be glad to learn that the University of Edinburgh is preparing for publication by subscription a complete Calendar of the collection of writs—over 3000 in number—bequeathed to the library by the late David Laing, LL.D. The work will form a goodly volume of 800 pages, with necessary indexes, in the style of the Government Record publications; and as it will contain abridgments of all the writs, which date from 1160 A.D. downwards, it will offer a large field for research. The full value of the work, even to the general public, will be understood when it is stated that, while some districts are more largely represented than others, the writs affect nearly every county in Scotland, and contain copious references to persons and places in their respective localities. Especially is this the case with writs of properties in Edinburgh and other burghs, of which there are many. The numerous charters between 1160 and 1400 contain much information as to old names of places and families, while those of later date are also useful as indicating boundaries of lands, forms of tenure, and peculiar customs. English writs are also represented, and upwards of a hundred of the older ones relate to Northumberland. To place this large and important body of information before the public a subscription list is opened, and intending subscribers are asked to send their names to the librarian. The edition will be limited, and the price—a guinea—will be raised to purchasers after publication.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

JUNE—IN COUNTRY AND TOWN.

THIS morning I heard the thrush sing
From his branch at the edge of the wood;
The lark—oh, he soared and trilled
Just as gladly as ever he could.
And the children here in town,
As I watch them pass along,
Are all of them tripping with happy feet
To the tune of their hearts' own song.

For it's June in the sunny meadow,
It is June in the dingy street,
And the organ plays in the narrow ways
To the children's dancing feet.
Oh! it's June, June, June,
And the world is all in tune;
I hear the beat of the children's feet,
And the buzz of the summer noon.

The sun is a-blaze in the sky,
The grass in the meadow is deep;
The windows in town are gay, are gay,
And flowers in London are cheap.
And the horses' feet keep time,
In the noonday's drowsy hum,
To voices that break into happy song
For joy that the summer is come.
Oh! it's June, June, June,
And the world is all in tune:
And hearts must beat when flowers are sweet,
And the summer comes so soon.

To-night with the moon on her throne
All the woods are a wonder of dreams;
The streets in the town look strange
In the pomp of her silvery beams.
And the winds in park and square
Go whispering to and fro,
And all of the leaves are awake and stir
At the touch of the fairy glow.

For it's June in the grassy meadow,
It is June in the city street;
And the moon is bright in the summer night
And the summer winds are sweet.
Oh, it's June, June, June,
And the world is all in tune:
And all hearts beat in the summer heat
For bliss of the summer's boon.

OBITUARY.

EDWARD ROSS WHARTON.

THE small band of students of philology in England has suffered a heavy loss by the death of Mr. E. R. Wharton, fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. Though never very strong, he seemed latterly to have recovered from the effects of more than one severe illness. Up to Wednesday of last week he was able to be about and do his ordinary work. Alarming symptoms then suddenly set in, and he died on the afternoon of Thursday, June 4, in his house at Oxford, overlooking the Parks. In accordance with his express wish, his body was taken to Woking for cremation, and his ashes were scattered to the winds.

Edward Ross Wharton was born on August 4, 1844, at Rhyl, in Flintshire, which gave him a qualification by birth for a Welsh fellowship at Jesus. He was the second son of the Rev. Henry James Wharton, vicar of Mitcham, in Surrey. His mother—who survives him—was a daughter of the Right Hon. Thomas Peregrine Courtenay, brother of the tenth Earl of Devon. A younger brother, Henry Thornton Wharton—who died in August of last year—was himself well known as the author of a charming book on Suppho, which has passed through several editions.

Edward Wharton was educated as a day-boy at the Charterhouse, then in its old quarters at Smithfield, under the head-mastership of Canon Elwyn. Prof. Jebb and Prof. Nettleship belonged to a slightly earlier generation; among his immediate contemporaries was the present Attorney-General. In 1862, he was elected to a scholarship at Trinity College, Oxford, at the same time with his life-long friend, Mr. John Gent; but neither of them came into residence until October of the following year. It used to be said of him among the undergraduates, that he had read Liddell & Scott through. When asked in later life whether this was true, he replied: "Yes; except that I read it through twice." He won the Ireland in his second year, though for the Hertford and the Craven he came out only as proxime. In classical moderations, and again in the final school of Literae Humaniores, he was placed in the first class, among other names in the list being those of Prof. Case and Prof. Wallace. Shortly after taking his degree, he was elected to a fellowship at Jesus, in company with the present Bishop of Chester; and he remained associated with that college until his death, adopting enthusiastically its Welsh traditions and the linguistic tastes of many of his colleagues.

In 1870, he forfeited his fellowship by marriage. His wife was a daughter of the late Samuel Hicks Withers, of Willesden, to whom he had been attached from boyhood. They had no children. But she devoted herself to his interests, sharing his travels, entertaining his friends, encouraging the amusements of the undergraduates, and—when need arose—nursing him with the utmost solicitude. After a brief period of school-work at Clifton, he returned to Oxford, and was re-elected to an official fellowship at Jesus, his duties being those of assistant tutor and Latin lecturer.

Wharton was always passionately fond of travel. In his undergraduate days he had made the acquaintance of Karl Baedeker, of Coblenz, whither he had gone to consult an oculist; and the earlier editions of Baedeker's Guide-books owe not a little to his suggestions. Later on, he gave continual help to the series of "Thorough Guides," edited by Baddeley and Ward. He had walked on foot over great part of the British Isles, and at one time used to go every autumn to Switzerland or Tyrol. He also managed in his vacations to visit Greece and Italy, Canada and the United States, Palestine and Egypt, Russia and Norway.

But while travel was his amusement, philology was the serious occupation of his life. Starting from an exceptionally wide and exact knowledge of Latin and Greek, he made it his business to become acquainted with everything that the Germans wrote on his subject, though he did not enlist in any one of their many schools. He also taught himself enough of the cognate languages, to enable him to avoid mistakes in illustrating his Latin and Greek etymologies. His methods were essentially critical. He had no scruple in adopting from others whatever commended itself to his independent judgment; but, for the most part, he worked on original lines, and paid the penalty of being sometimes misunderstood.

In 1882—before, as he himself admitted, he had fully realised the difficulties of his subject—he published Etyma Græca: an etymological lexicon of classical Greek, in which are given (somewhat dogmatically, and without adequate explanation) etymologies of about 5000 words to be found in the standard authors. This was followed, in 1890—when he had acquired a firmer grasp of the principles of scientific etymology—by Etyma Latina, constructed on a similar plan, though with some concessions to weaker brethren: notably, an appendix, showing the changes which letters undergo in the sister tongues as well as in Latin. Between 1888 and 1893, he sent several papers to the London Philological Society, entitled "Latin Vocalism," "Loanwords in Latin," "Latin Consonant Laws," "The Greek Indirect Negative," and "Some Greek Etymologies"; and in 1892, induced by his esteem for M. Victor Henry, he wrote a notable paper (in French) for the Société Linguistique on "Quelques a Latins." He was also an occasional contributor to the ACADEMY and the Classical Review. It happens that the June number of the latter, which has appeared since his death, contains a brief note from him on "The Origin of the Construction ab ut," which he illustrates both from palaeographic sources and from Sanskrit. We must not forget to mention two translations, of the Poetics of Aristotle and of Book I. of Horace's Satires, in which it pleased him to exhibit verbal fidelity to the original, combined with a mastery of English idiom.

In his preface to Etyma Latina, which is characteristically dated on St. David's Day, Wharton remarks that "in England even the worst etymologist meets little encouragement." There can be no doubt that his failure to win public recognition induced him latterly to turn to a fresh subject—genealogy, which has this much at least in common with philology, that it is equally capable of precise statement. The first research to which he addressed himself was to obtain evidence of the descent of his father from the Westmoreland Whartons. In this he was unsuccessful, though he succeeded in tracing his pedigree through a long chain of copyholders at Winfarthing, in Norfolk. He was thus led on to study the history of all who bore the name of Wharton or Warton. The greatest of these, of course, were the Whartons of Wharton Hall, in Westmoreland, regarding whom he compiled, mostly from the Public Records and other unpublished sources, no less than fourteen volumes of MS. collections. One result of his exhaustive researches may be mentioned, for the benefit of G. E. C. when he reaches the name of Wharton in his New Baronage. In the Wharton Peerage Case it was laid down by the House of Lords that the barony was created by writ in the first year of Edward VI., and consequently descended to heirs general. This decision, which agrees with the account in Dugdale, seems to have been arrived at only because no patent could be discovered. But Wharton found documentary evidence in two places that the barony was really created by patent in the fourteenth year of Henry VIII.: (1) in a contemporary letter, recently printed in the Hamilton Papers, stating that on such a day in 1533 the Duke of —, then in command of an English army within the Scottish border, presented their patents to Lord Wharton and Lord Evers—the Evers barony is admitted to have been by patent; (2) in some MS. notes by a later Lord Wharton, correcting Dugdale, which are preserved among the Carte Papers in the Bodleian. The importance of this discovery is that the barony, if by patent, would be limited to heirs male of the body; and, therefore, the claimant in the Wharton Peerage Case, who represented one of several co-heiresses, must have lost his labour.

Such was the active career of Edward Wharton, as it might be seen by many. His inner self he revealed to very few. Shy by temperament, or perhaps from the circumstances of his early youth, he adopted a taciturn and even cynical manner, which naturally gave rise to misinterpretation, when in the company of strangers. If his brother Harry wore his heart upon his sleeve, Edward concealed his behind a mask. His affections were really as deep and strong, as were his intellectual powers and his devotion to learning. In all the private relations of life, none was more sympathetic, none more loyal. But, as Charles Lamb somewhere confesses, he could not like all persons alike. His love he reserved for his friends; but he did his duty to everybody, and was incapable of unkindness to any created thing. The present writer has been privileged to enjoy an unbroken intimacy with him for nearly thirty years: he sat by his side at the same scholars' table; he was his comrade in his walking-tours; he was a guest in his house in the last week of his life. The characters of all of us are moulded by our friendships, especially by our old friendships; and there can be no more worthy memorial of one who is gone than the influence he must continue to exercise upon those who knew him best.

As he would have himself said, in the words of his favourite Horace:

"Absint inani funere nemine
Luctusque turpes et querimoniae:
Compescere clamorem ac sepulchri
Mitte supervacuos honores."

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for June opens with a brilliantly written paper by Dr. Stalker on vol. i. of Wendt's work on "The Teaching of Christ." Perhaps critical students need the stimulus of a great preacher's attack on such a moderate statement of their position. Dr. Bruce is not deterred from continuing his popular critical essays on the history of Jesus. Dr. Denney writes persuasively on the well-worn subject of Psalm cx. Prof. Ramsay gives a note on the "sixth hour" of John xix. 14. A sermon-essay on Abraham by the late Dr. Dale and a survey of recent books by Dr. Dods complete this number.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for June contains much that is both important and interesting even for English readers. Dr. Prins gives a condensed account of a work which is in danger of being overlooked from its almost excessive erudition—Baumgarten on Seneca and Christianity, an examination of the comparative value of Christianity and the later paganism, the latter being represented by Seneca. Dr. Völter seeks to show that we have in Luke i. a Christianised form of a Jewish Apocalypse of Zacharias, the father of John. Dr. Brandt replies to some criticisms upon his very able book, "Die Evangelische Geschichte" (1893). Among reviews and notices of books, the productions of English scholarship are not neglected. Driver's "Deuteronomy" is noticed at some length, with high appreciation, though the reviewer gently touches upon the author's excessive tendency to make concessions to apologetic theology. Moore's "Judges" is more briefly noticed, the merits of the literary form and typographical arrangement being specially referred to, also the learning and delicate tact displayed in the treatment of text-critical questions. Girdlestone's "Deuterographs" will, it is said, be useful to many, in spite of the unattainable apologetic object which the author has in view. The German translation of Robertson Smith's "Old Testament in the Jewish Church" is recommended as a fair translation of an excellent work. Three recent English review-articles on the relations of archaeology to Old Testament criticism by Cheyne, Sayce, and Bevan are summarised; and it is not difficult to see behind the guarded expressions of the writer (Prof. Koster) a profound discontent with the treatment both of archaeology and of criticism by Prof. Sayce.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AGASSIZ AND DARWIN.

Rome: June 6, 1896.

In the review of the Life of Louis Agassiz (ACADEMY, May 30) I see repeated the absurd accusation of "his hostility to Darwinism," which has been so stated as to induce the persuasion, both in England and America, that Agassiz was capable of "hostility" to any form of genuinely scientific research; and it has in many cases been stated as hostility to Darwin personally, and to imply that he had treated Darwin or his theories with prejudice and bigotry.

As I was, during all the years just before and after the advent of the theories of Darwin, in intimate relations with Agassiz, and often talked with him about the theory of evolution, I hope that you will allow me to say a word which will tell the position at that time, and until a period shortly before his death, of Agassiz to evolution and theology.

He was certainly of the opinion that the theory of evolution as expounded by Darwin did not satisfactorily account for the creation, any more than did that expounded by Lamarck; and I think that some convinced evolutionists are now of the same opinion. But the attitude he took was this, and I remember his words as he stated it—that the Darwinian theory did not come within the true scope of science; that it belonged to teleology and that to theology, that the object of natural science was to note and classify phenomena, not to account for them.

As to his theological ideas, I have heard him say that he accepted the first chapter of Genesis so far as it recorded the order of creation, but nothing more of the Bible; and those who knew his position at that time will remember the storm that burst about his head when he made the declaration that he did not believe that all mankind had descended from one original Adam. He certainly did believe in the Divine order and origin of creation; and holding that he could not be expected to limit those agencies to preliminary steps, he did, on the contrary, accept the intention of Deity throughout.

But those who have enjoyed his intimacy know that he had a great affection and the highest esteem for Darwin personally; that he was never "hostile" to anything or anybody; and that his differences, scientific or personal, were always those of a philosopher and not of a polemist. He always said that Darwin's theory of evolution did not account for certain known facts; and I am convinced that, if he had lived until the doctrine of evolution had attained its present stage of development, his attitude towards it would have been different. The last time I saw Owen, his friend and colleague, Owen said to me, "If I could have had a half-hour's talk with Agassiz before he died, I believe I could have brought him to accept the theory of evolution." Agassiz' devotion to the truth as he saw it was supreme, and if his temperament had permitted him to be an atheist nothing in the world would have prevented him from declaring it; but there was not a trace of bigotry or "hostility" towards anything but charlatanism. He felt intensely the presence of Deity in creation, and preventively, but not with bigotry, rejected what denied it, directly or impliedly. We who have outlived him, and seen the doctrine carried to heights which probably Darwin, no more than Lamarck, ever dreamed of, must not judge of the rejection of it by Agassiz as we would judge of its repudiation at the present time.

Mr. Benn's remark, that "he managed to be always in hot water, he habitually left his numerous assistants unpaid, and he seems to have appropriated their labours without due acknowledgment," can only have been honestly made by one who knew nothing of his life. He was so utterly absorbed in his studies that he habitually spent every penny he got on his collections and his museum, without even thinking of his own wants. He may have forgotten to pay an assistant, as he did sometimes to take his own dinner; but anything like the neglect of a debt or an obligation of any kind was absolutely foreign to his nature. He was always willing to work for nothing, and it would not have been strange if such a man forgot that other people were not like himself. He maintained himself by teaching a girls' school, not to divert from the museum the offerings made him for his work. It is difficult to understand what Mr. Benn means by the "turbulent life" of Agassiz, at least so far as his American existence is concerned; for he lived in the centre of a society that worshipped him, and was the object of such honours as few scientific men in their lives have attained, so far as that American society went. If his European state was what Mr. Benn describes, he made a happy translation of it into American terms; for on that side of the Atlantic he was only molested by timid spurts of ecclesiastical bigotry, and that not for long. He refused a senatorship and the keepership of the Jardin des Plantes, in order not to leave his American studies, and an offer of an enormous sum for a course of lectures from an American speculator, because "he had no time to make money." In all my own acquaintance with him I never heard him speak a narrow or unkind word of any man.

"AN AMERICAN PIRATE."

Seapoint, co. Dublin: June 10, 1896.

Perhaps Mr. Mosher of Portland, Maine, may have acted like the gallant highwaymen of old, who thought the rich were fair game and transferred some of their wealth to the poor. I do not defend the taking; but still I think it only fair to state that my experience of Mr. Mosher differs from that of my more widely known literary brethren, Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. Lionel Johnson.

Shortly after the appearance of Homeward; Songs by the Way, Mr. Mosher wrote to me asking permission to reprint, and he accepted my terms without any demur. I have always found him friendly, and I am more than satisfied with the result of his business relations with me. I think it right to state this, as Mr. Mosher could, if he so wished, have reprinted the songs without paying any royalty at all.

GEO. W. RUSSELL.

TALMUDIC ELEMENTS IN THE "ACTS OF ABERCUS."

Oxford: June 8, 1896.

Let me correct an odd slip made by me in my letter of last week. Of course ἀδελφή means "sister" and not "daughter." Domitilla, the wife of Clement, was therefore a daughter of Vespasian, before whom (according to Josephus) the Jew Eleazar exhibited his power of casting out demons. This being so, the inter-relation of the various stories to which my letter referred becomes still closer.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, June 14, 7 p.m. Ethical: "Should Interest be Paid?" by Mr. J. A. Hobson.
MONDAY, June 15, 2.30 p.m. Geographical: Anniversary Meeting.

TUESDAY, June 16, 5 p.m. Statistical: "Railway Rates and Terminal Charges," by Mr. Richard Price-Williams.

8.30 p.m. Zoological: "General Remarks on a Zoological Journey up the Amazons," by Mr. E. E. Austin; "A Contribution to the Anatomy of the Hostia (Opisthocentrus crinitus)," by Mr. P. Chalmers Mitchell; "The Occurrence of Tomistoma schlegelii in the Malay Peninsula, with Remarks on the Atlas and Axis of Crocodilians," by Mr. G. A. Boulenger; and "Walker's American Types of Lepidoptera at Oxford," by Mr. W. Schaus.

WEDNESDAY, June 17, 7.30 p.m. Meteorological: "Arctic Hall and Thunderstorms," by Mr. Henry Harries; "Climatology of Valencia Island, co. Kerry," by Mr. J. E. Cullum; and (probably) "The Winter Climate of Egypt, based on Results from Self-recording Instruments, 1893-4," by Dr. H. E. Leigh Canney.

8 p.m. Microscopical.
8 p.m. Elizabethan: "Jeremy Collier," by Mr. R. F. Backwell.

THURSDAY, June 18, 4 p.m. National Indian Association: Annual Meeting; "Reminiscences of Western India," by Mr. H. A. Acworth.

8 p.m. Linnean: "The Intermuscular Bones of Fishes," by Prof. T. W. Bridge; "The Value of Specific Characters," by Dr. A. R. Wallace; "Descriptions of some new Species of Ferulaceae, in the Collection of the British Museum," by Mr. W. F. Kirby; "The Epiphragm of Helix aspersa," by Prof. G. J. Allman.

8 p.m. Chemical: "The Action of Bromine on Pinene in reference to the Question of its Constitution," by Prof. Tilden; "Santalal and some of its Derivatives," by Messrs. A. C. Chapman and H. E. Burgess; "The Explanation of some Anomalies in Thermochemistry, Chloral and Bromal Hydrates," by Mr. W. J. Pope; "The Production of Chlorine by heating a Mixture of Manganese Dioxide and Potassium Chlorate," II, by Prof. McLeod; "The Rotation of Aspartic Acid," by Mr. B. M. C. Marshall; "The Occurrence of Quercetin in the Outer Skins of the Bulb of the Onion," and "The Colouring Principle contained in the Bark of Myrica nagi," I, by Messrs. A. G. Perkin and J. J. Hummel; "Some New Derivatives from Camphoramide," by Dr. M. O. Forster; "Acetylene, its Detection and Ignition in the Air," by Prof. Clowes.

8.30 p.m. Antiquaries.

SCIENCE.

THE NEW SYRIAC GOSPELS FROM SINAI.

Some Pages Retranscribed from the Sinaitic Palimpsest. With a Translation of the whole Text by Agnes Smith Lewis. (Cambridge: University Press.)

THE great debt we all owe to Mrs. Lewis is considerably increased by this new volume. Her recent visit to Sinai has resulted in the filling up of many lacunae in the Lewis Codex, and the determination or correction of many readings that were doubtful. And the considerate manner in which the new text is printed—distinguished from the previous text by blue type—enables one to realise the fresh gains without difficulty.

Readers will naturally turn first to the lacuna Luke i. 16-39. In the light of the now famous reading in Matt. i. 16, "Joseph begat Jesus," it would be so interesting to know whether the Old Syriac agreed with the Old Latin (b) in omitting Luke i. 34. Alas! this lacuna remains. But though there is no such startling treasure-trove as we have had, the new matter that Mrs. Lewis gives us is often exceedingly important. For example:

1. In Matt. xii. 22 we find our new authority agreeing with the Old Latin and the Diatessaron in making the blind mute also "deaf" (cf. Mark vii. 32)—a peculiarity which one might, indeed, have anticipated, were it not that the text we already had differed from the Old Latin in omitting "et surdum" from the parallel passage Matt. ix. 32.

2. In Mark iii. 21 we find agreement with the Peschito instead of support for that reading of D and the Old Latin ἡ ἐξίστατο αὐτοῦ, "exentiat eos," which ἐξίστατο in the parallel passage (Matt. xii. 23) makes so interesting. Mrs. Lewis calls attention to the fact that her Codex uses the same word for "His friends" in this verse as for "His brethren" a few verses further on—in this differing from the Peschito.

3. In the genealogy (Luke iii. 23-38) we have the list of names (with a single exception) complete—somewhat surprisingly, when we consider that the Old Latin omits three—τοῦ Ματθαίου, τοῦ Ἀμὼς . . . τοῦ Μαθθ; that Julius Africanus omits τοῦ Ματθαί, τοῦ Λευὶ in v. 24—interpolated possibly from v. 29; and that Irenaeus reckons seventy-two generations instead of our present seventy-six.

Mrs. Lewis's present work is practically final, except that about nine verses of Matt. xiv. still remain concealed in the binding for some future voyager from Sinai to bring back. Many of the new passages have been restored with the help of the re-agent, and cannot, therefore, be tested by the photographs. One or two slips of the pen may be noticed in the Preface—e.g., where we are told that "it has been suspected that these words ['Woe unto us for our sins'] were contained in the Doctrine of Addai"; but such slips are few, and detract but slightly from the value of the volume.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK.

Liverpool: May 30, 1896.

The letter which I despatched on May 16 appears in the ACADEMY this morning, and I am reminded thereby that I have still to reply to Prof. Conway on the vowels and on accent. The vowels and diphthongs in dispute fall naturally into two groups, o, u, ou, y, and ε, η, ι, γ.

In the former group we have still a theoretical disagreement about ou, but it has never extended to practice, and it is useless to pursue it further. We both recommend in practice that ou shall be Eng. long oo = Fr. ou = Lat. u. Prof. Conway also now indicates a via media about o, to which I can at least provisionally agree. Let the teacher try to give a "close" value to o—practically I think he will get it more easily by shortening his native English "oh" than from any foreign standpoint—and let the student imitate him, if he can and will; but let the teacher be at liberty to accept an ordinary English (or Welsh) open o if he finds the other too difficult for the pupil. Our differences as to u and y are practically one: namely, whether the u in these sounds is to be pronounced open or close—i.e., like Eng. "awe," or like Eng. "oh." Prof. Conway advocates the former alternative: I the latter. But Prof. Conway is wrong in saying that I consider the aw sound difficult to teach. On the contrary, I said (ACADEMY, April 18) "as to u, it is equally easy for English students to acquire it as aw or o." My reasons for preferring o are these: (1) that I see no other way of avoiding confusion between u and y; (2) that in adopting aw we abandon not only our former practice, but the very convenient equivalence of u with Lat. u, and the still greater convenience of keeping in line with Greek students in other countries. The certainty of confusion between u and y arises from the fact that, if u = aw, both these diphthongs consist of the same elements. The only difference between them would consist in the different duration of the two constituents. We might represent them symbolically as ( $\frac{1}{2}$  aw +  $\frac{1}{2}$  i) and ( $\frac{1}{2}$  aw +  $\frac{1}{2}$  ε) respectively. But a pair of sounds like these would be a constant stumbling-block, even to teachers; and would lead to an inevitable confusion between two of the most important inflexions in the language. But with u = o the two diphthongs are qualitatively distinguished, as (aw + i) and (u + i), thus delivering both teacher and pupil from a laborious quantitative nicety which it would be very difficult, but at the same time quite imperative, to observe.

Next as to ε, η, ι, γ. Prof. Conway continues to say that the equation (ε = long ε) is a commonplace of Greek grammar, and he refers me thereon to Brugmann, Gr. Gram., p. 34, note 2. But the said passage simply proves my case. It exhibits Brugmann on the defensive against Meisterhans and Blas; and after looking up all the references in each author, I am still convinced that Brugmann has the worst of the argument. There are two points which the great Indo-Germanist seems to me to leave out of sight—(1) that up to the fourth century B.C. Attic spelling was essentially phonetic, and aimed constantly to represent simple vowels by single letters, and diphthongs by digraphs; (2) that phonologists no longer receive summary equations such as ε = ε = later i, as expressing in a probable manner the whole change involved. Students of living language do not often find such changes as that of long ε to i taking place at one leap, especially in languages which lend themselves readily to diphthongisation. In such languages the process of change is normally from long ε to (ε + i) and thence to long i, by a gradual growth of the second element of the diphthong, at the expense of the first. This is exactly what happened in Attica. The long ε of the Attic pre-classical period becomes (ε + i) during the classical period, and inscribers during that period spelt it oftener and oftener ι, until it ceases to be spelt ε altogether. But the original pre-classical ε continues to be spelt ε without change, until both sounds coalesce, as ε in spelling and (ε + i) in sound. They are thus already well launched on the way towards long (French) i, and we are then not surprised to find that that change is already complete when the Roman period begins, Grk ε being then transliterated by Latin i. I feel quite sure that Prof. Conway will eventually come round to my view on this matter; but in the meantime he concedes nearly all that I want, in allowing that the pronunciation (ε + i) has authority. That brings it, at any rate, within the scope of our present choice, if found preferable on other grounds.

As regards my argument that γ was changing in the fourth century B.C. from long ε to long ι, the reader will see (ACADEMY, April 4) that it is not based "only on a doubtful inference from Aristotle"; and I would also like to ask Prof. Conway how he would otherwise explain that standing confusion between ε and γ in the fourth century B.C., which he himself has brought into prominence. The root of that confusion is simply that ε and γ were becoming identical in quality, so that to the ear of the inscriber ε and ι meant exactly the same thing. But here, again, for practical purposes I need only quote the Professor's own letter (ACADEMY, February 15):

"It is throwing dust in the eyes of the non-technical reader to talk of the distinction in quality between γ and ε, which naturally seems to be of no practical value, seeing that they are distinguished by quantity in any case."

Minor theoretical differences being thus brushed aside, we can proceed to consider the group, ε, η, ι, γ, from a purely practical standpoint, and therefore in part, after all, from the standpoint of the British boy. Prof. Conway now justly appreciates that, next to Greek phonetics, English phonetics is the subject most important in its bearing on this whole scheme of reform. We must build so far as possible upon that which is in the boy already, rather than on foreign key-words which he has, perhaps, never heard. As to ε, I accept the same compromise as for o; let the teacher endeavour to pronounce it as a short, close ε, but let him at the same time refrain from struggling with pupils who can only give back their native English (or Welsh) open ε. The other three, η, ι, γ, are the crux of Greek vowel reform; but I have been pleased to learn, since this discussion commenced, from the testimony of teachers of French, that English boys do readily acquire a long open ε vowel. The simplest method of acquiring it seems to be by learning to prolong the short English ε (in red, &c.). This opens the way to a phonetic differentiation of η, ι, γ, rather better than that which I recommended before, and precisely parallel to that just recommended for u, o, y. The differentiation of the two diphthongs will always be imperfect, unless they are distinguished by the quality as well as by the quantity of the two constituents; and the whole difference between an indicative and a subjunctive is often nothing more than the difference between an ε and an γ. The widest difference which it is possible to make between them is to put ε = (ε + i) and γ = (ε + ε). This would lead up to γ = long ε, which is, I think, exactly what Prof. Conway desires, though, as he justly observes, it would no longer matter very much whether it was ε or ε, when ε had been made diphthongal. Moreover, this diphthongal ε is represented with great appropriateness by the English boy's ei or ey in "rein," "feign," "grey," "obey," &c., which is really diphthongal. Dr. Murray writes it (ε): the i element is made longer and more audible by South-country boys than by North-country boys. But this slight difference is itself some parallel to the hesitation of the monuments. I would, therefore, at once discard all foreign keywords for any of these vowels. We shall then have built for the English boy a reformed pronunciation of Greek sounds which requires him to learn nothing really foreign except French u and German ch; and to the Welsh boy these are hardly foreign. We shall also now have, with the exception of one diphthong, a language spelt, as Archinus intended it to be, phonetically. We shall no longer in any case give the same sound to different symbols, nor the same symbol to different sounds, nor, with this one exception, a simple sound to a double symbol. We shall restore to the Greek language all that varied phonic melody in which it was originally so rich. The exceptional diphthong is ou; and Prof. Conway will perhaps wonder why, after contending so strongly for ε = (ε + i), I allow the very parallel case of ou = (o + u) to go by default. For one thing, it would conflict with the usual transliteration of Latin u; for another, it would be hard for English boys to keep u = o distinct from ou = (o + u), especially for South-country boys, whose native u in "bone" is really (o + u) or (o + w). But I was further swayed by the consideration that if ou is not made u, the Greek vowel system would be left without one of the cardinal sounds of human speech; and it seems to me that this is a matter wherein, if an option exists, aesthetic considerations may very properly be allowed to weigh.

My objection to the key-word "oar" was that it was ambiguous; it conveyed one thing to a North-countryman and another thing to a South-countryman. Still more did I object to the implication that the southern pronunciation was "normal." The northern pronunciation of the present day is, if anything, more normal than the southern, for the simple reason that the south is continually acquiring new corruptions from London—corruptions which the rest of the English-speaking world now refuses to follow. I have dealt with this subject at length in a forthcoming article in another review. As a better key-word for long open o (= awe), Prof. Conway himself suggests "broad." This will do very well. His fear that we in Lancashire will think he means brād is quite groundless. We are not all rustics here; and even our rustics, being Mercians, not Northumbrians, tend to say brōd rather than brād; while the rest of us no more think of saying either brōd or brād than Mr. Gladstone does, or than Mr. Bright did.

There remains the difficult question of accent. Prof. Conway himself simply adheres to his old self-contradictory position, that it is possible to give proper intonation to a Greek sentence without giving proper intonation to the words of which it is composed. He therefore really puts himself outside of the discussion about Greek word-accent altogether, but he does introduce other testimonies which materially bear upon this reform. The one is from an experienced teacher, who reports success in teaching Greek accents with a direct musical value. The other is a letter from Prof. Jebb, evidently written with direct reference to my letter in the ACADEMY of April 18. What I should like to ask the former is whether his pupils have succeeded in placing musical accent upon the proper syllables without also placing there a slight stress; or do his pupils still pronounce Greek words with Latin stress, as has hitherto been the practice of the schools? Experience in these matters is very scarce, and every ounce of it is of value. This scarcity arises partly from a very honourable cause: namely, that a Greek teacher naturally hesitates, from motives of duty, in committing his pupils, or any of them, to an abnormal and conventionally incorrect pronunciation.

Prof. Jebb does me the justice of seeing what Prof. Conway totally ignores, namely, that I do not advocate a slight stress for its own sake, but only as a stepping-stone to the musical accent. If the musical accent can be taught to English students directly, by all means let it be done. I am quite willing, for one, to make the experiment; but I imagine that even then a slight stress will inevitably accompany the musical accent; for I, as teacher, will certainly not attempt to perpetuate the unauthorised stress accent at present in use. This being so, I shall possibly incur the risk, pointed out by Prof. Jebb and based on experience, of destroying the quantities. But to what extent would the quantities really be endangered? Is there any risk at all of English students lengthening every accented vowel without exception, like a modern Greek? None whatever. The only words where we run any risk at all are those whose accent falls on a short vowel which is not followed by a consonant—e.g., in such words as ἀγάθη, σοφία, τίσιμα. And the risk which we run here does not arise from any law of nature, but merely from a habitude of English and German speech, which is certainly capable of being set aside by practice and care. In fighting with this habitude the musical accent ought to be an assistance, because we do sometimes sing such vowels as these to short notes, though we never speak them as short syllables. I might point out, as a further motive to reform, that the present system already murders quantity almost as effectually as any other stress-accent could do. Greek instruction in this country generally begins with δ, ῥ, τ = hō, hī, tō—two false quantities out of a possible three, and its further progress is worthy of this beginning. Prof. Conway says that he and Prof. Arnold have an open mind on this subject; it would be a pleasure to hear that they had determined to give the musical accent a direct trial. With Welsh students I think that they would have an exceptional chance of success.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, for the reception of the annual report, the presentation of medals, and the election of officers, will be held on Monday next, at 5 p.m., in the theatre of the University of London, Burlington Gardens. On the same evening the annual dinner will take place at the Hôtel Métropole; and on Wednesday evening a conversation will be given in the galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours.

At the meeting of the Linnean Society, to be held at Burlington House on Thursday next, Dr. A. R. Wallace will read a paper on "The Value of Specific Characters."

AN extra evening meeting of the members of the Royal Institution will be held on Friday next, at 9 p.m., when Mr. Thomas C. Martin, of New York, American delegate to the Kelvin jubilee, will deliver a lecture on "The Utilisation of Niagara," with illustrations.

On Saturday of this week, the Geologists Association will visit Reading, under the direction of Prof. J. H. Blake and Mr. H. W. Monckton, in order to study the junction of fossiliferous basement-beds of London clay with Reading beds.

SIR GEORGE STOKES (Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge) and Dr. Carl Ludolf Griesbach (director of the Geological Survey of India) have been elected honorary members of the Academy of Sciences at Vienna.

A PORTRAIT in oils of the late Prof. Huxley has been presented to the Geological Society by Sir John Evans.

THE conversation of the Society of Arts will be held in the South Kensington Museum on Wednesday next.

THE following is a list of the new council of the Institution of Civil Engineers, which was elected at the annual meeting held last week: President, Mr. John Wolfe Barry; vice-presidents, Mr. W. H. Preece, Sir Douglas Fox, Mr. James Mansergh, and Dr. William Anderson; other members, Mr. A. R. Binnie, Mr. Henry Deane, Mr. W. R. Galbraith, Mr. George Graham, Mr. J. H. Greathead, Mr. J. C. Hawkhaw, Mr. Charles Hawksley, Dr. John Hopkinson, Prof. A. B. W. Kennedy, Mr. John Kennedy, Mr. G. Fosbery Lyster, Sir Guilford L. Molesworth, Sir Andrew Noble, Mr. William Shelford, Dr. B. B. Stoney, Mr. F. W. Webb, Sir W. H. White, and Sir E. Leader Williams. Of these, Mr. Henry Deane represents Australia, and Mr. John Kennedy, Canada.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

WE are glad to hear that, in response to a memorial influentially signed by Orientalists and students of Early English, the First Lord of the Treasury has granted pensions of £25 on the Civil List to each of the three unmarried daughters of the late Dr. Richard Morris.

SUBSCRIBERS to the English Dialect Dictionary should send in their subscriptions at once to the Rev. Prof. Skeat, 2, Salisbury-villas, Cambridge (treasurer), in order that copies of part i. may be distributed to them in July. The number of unpaid subscriptions is so considerable that a good deal of trouble and delay is likely to arise from this circumstance.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. have in the press a work by the late E. F. M. Benecke, of Balliol College, Oxford, who, it may be remembered, lost his life last summer in the Alps. The book deals with The Position of Women in Greek Poetry. About two-thirds of the whole was completed; and this portion is now published in accordance with the advice of several scholars, who have expressed an opinion that the fragments might be useful to those engaged in similar studies. The author endeavours to show, by a detailed study of the fragments of the Greek lyric writers, the works of the tragedians, and the remains of the comedians, the great difference in the treatment of women manifested in the New Comedy and in the Alexandrian poets on the one hand, and in all earlier literature on the other. The causes of this change are investigated, and reasons are advanced for attaching great importance to Antimachus of Colophon in the history of this development.

MESSRS. LUZAC & Co. inform us that they have purchased the greater part of the private library of the late Dr. Reinhold Rost, for many years librarian to the Indian Office; and that they propose to issue shortly a catalogue of the books.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF LITERATURE.—(Thursday, May 28.)

LORD HALSBURY, president, in the chair.—Prof. Max Müller delivered an address on "Coincidences." He began by saying that, in 1845, two Roman Catholic missionaries in Tibet discussed singular coincidences between the services and observances of their own religion and those of the Buddhists—celibacy, holy water, beads for prayer, vestments. These coincidences were ascribed by some faithful Christians to the Devil. But the studies of the learned Wilkins, Colebrooke, and others discovered some light in language. Dugald Stewart thought the Brahmins had been guilty of fraud in imitating Greek and Latin. But it was Frederick Schlegel who first detected a real linguistic connexion between the tongues of the Far East and those of modern Europe. But there were also coincidences which were apparently purely fortuitous. There were, in fact, two classes of coincidences—those which we had a right and those which we had no right to expect. The production of fire by rubbing two sticks was common to many nations; but it was a suggestion of nature herself. There was an ancient legend that Buddha, in the form of a bird, had predicted fire from the friction of boughs and warned the other birds to fly. If there were a rational explanation, none other need be sought. But mitres, croziers, copes, beads, censers as religious symbols were not strictly rational; and the only suggestion left was actual communication. Now, it was an historical fact that in the seventh and eighth centuries Christian missionaries—chiefly Nestorians—penetrated into China, and records of their labours exist both in China and Europe. But in 841 Christianity was extirpated, and Marco Polo reported all the Chinese to be heathen. Christian monks and Buddhist priests had frequent intercourse. Thus there was no need for reference to diabolic agency. Another class of coincidences between Buddhism and Christianity belonged to ancient Buddhism—such as exorcisms, rosaries, celibacy of the clergy—and could not be explained by actual contact. Common human nature and needs may have suggested common forms of expression. But Buddhism, like Christianity, was a missionary religion, and was active in Eastern Europe or Western Asia in the earliest centuries of our era. Clement of Alexandria was acquainted with the name of Buddha, and Eusebius, too, in the fourth century, knew of the Brahmins. Buddhist influence has been suspected in the Greek fables—such as the ass in the lion's skin—and even in the New Testament. Such coincidences were different from those of language and mythology. Jacob Grimm held that many of the familiar stories of the North of Europe had their origin in the times anterior to the Aryan separation, and had been preserved by tradition through those long ages. Such proverbs as Vestigia nulla retrorsum had probably no such early literary form; but such stories as that of Ocasus and Hercules might well be carried by itinerant storytellers from one country to another, and the literary exchange of East and West was, perhaps, earlier in date and greater in extent than was commonly suspected. But the fable was too artistic in form and too definite in purpose to have sprung up simultaneously in various places. The Greeks never claimed the form of fable as their own invention, though when they accepted them they gave them a characteristic Greek form. But in India the fable was clearly indigenous and existed before the rise of Buddhism, and was utilised by Buddha and his disciples. We know little of the origin of fables among the Greeks. Aesop was probably a Phrygian, and the name had been explained as meaning "swarthy"; and the earliest to give them a Greek form was Babrius. Many fables sprang probably from proverbs and short sayings; and illustrations of the saying "Save me from my friends" might be found in the earliest Sanskrit fables. Sir George Daseant had given like examples from early Norwegian literature. As we had clear evidence of constant communication between East and West, there was nothing fortuitous in the fables common to both; and there is little doubt that the original home of the fable was Central Asia and India, and so the charming stories of Lafontaine had a Sanskrit original. The common features of the framework of Christianity and Buddhism were in some cases very striking, and Buddha had almost been raised to the position of a Roman Catholic saint. The story of the three caskets in "The Merchant of Venice" certainly came from India, and it might be that the pound of flesh had its origin in the East. In their central conceptions no two religions could be more opposed than Buddhism and Christianity. But there were such coincidences as the Judgment of Solomon, which had its Buddhist counterpart. It is tolerably certain that such a story was not invented twice. It was, however, important in translation of Eastern stories to adhere to rigid grammatical accuracy, and not to use language which was suggested by or a reminiscence of Christian stories, as thereby coincidences might apparently be established which had little foundation in fact. There were sometimes seeming similarities between Buddhist and Christian parables, but the application and purpose were so different as to repel the notion of coincidence or derivation. One of the most striking coincidences was that of the miracle of walking on the water, which was common to Buddhism and Christianity, and was, of course, far anterior in the former to the Christian story. Such coincidences as this appeared to indicate an historical connexion. It was important that they should both be collected, and their historical and philosophical import carefully traced. The Buddhist canon was certainly in existence before Christianity, and the exact nature of the relation between the two religions remained for scholars to determine.—The president, in moving a vote of thanks to Prof. Max Müller, said the evidence of early Christian antiquity was much more cogent with him than that producible from the Oriental records with which the Professor was so familiar.

ARISTOTELIAN.—(Monday, June 1.)

Dr. BERNARD BOURANQUET, president, in the chair.—The report of the committee and accounts for the seventeenth session were adopted, and the officers of the society re-elected for the next session.—Mr. J. H. Muirhead read a paper on "The Place of the Concept in Logical Doctrine." He pointed out that the concept, regarded as an element in judgment, has no independent place in logic. The idea that it has can only spring from the supposed necessity of having concepts before judgments as the materials out of which the latter are formed, or from our supposed power of entertaining concepts which are not judgments. The former, which is Lotze's view, is no longer tenable. Knowledge grows, it is not built of pre-formed materials. Those who hold that we can have concepts without judgments do not perceive that what we have in that case is only a judgment of indeterminate modality. But there is another use of the term concept, according to which it is not an element of judgment, but the substratum or subject of all judgment. In this sense judgment may be said to be the attempt to express the contents of the concept, an attempt which is bound to fail. The doctrine of the concept must therefore precede the doctrine of the judgment; not as an element within it, but as that within which the judgment takes place.—The paper was followed by a discussion.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY.—(Imperial Institute, Tuesday, June 2.)

In introducing Dr. Markoff, who desired to make some remarks on "Trade between England and Russia," Mr. E. A. Cazalet, the president, said that the Haueatic League and Great Britain were the first to place Russia in commercial communication with Western Europe. The principal industrial and mechanical improvements, which had promoted the success of Russian manufactures, had originally been inaugurated by British enterprise. Commerce, until lately, had been looked down upon in Russia; and after the Crimean War private speculators, hoping to monopolise hemp, tallow, &c., brought disaster on themselves, and turned the attention of British merchants to other markets, especially the Colonies, where similar goods could be obtained, and where the sellers were more anxious to benefit the buyers. State interference with private enterprise had also at one time frightened away British capital from Russian markets. Mr. Cazalet paid a handsome tribute to the power of imitation and the docility of Russian workmen, who were not unpleasant to deal with, provided their employers were just and firm. The stupendous destiny which was certainly in store for Russia mainly depended on the natural good sense and future moral development of the peasant classes, who formed the great bulk of the population, and really were the blood and marrow of the Empire.—Dr. Markoff's paper stated in general terms that commerce, industry, mining, &c., in Russia presented a vast field for British capital and energy. The present Minister of Finance showed every desire to encourage foreign undertakings in Russia; but French, German, and Belgian business men had of late displayed more desire than Englishmen to benefit by these favourable circumstances. He (Dr. Markoff) expatiated, with many details, on a new Russian directory, which contained all particulars about products, trades, localities, and other useful information for those who might desire to enter into correspondence and business relations with various portions of the vast Empire. He was now translating this book for the benefit of the British public.—Prof. Mendeléeff (who spoke in Russian) thought that a comprehensive commercial alliance between England and Russia was a matter of paramount importance. There were affinities in the characteristics of both nations—such as aptitude for trade, steadiness of purpose, and attachment to the comforts and prosperity of family life, which would lend stability to, and insure the success of, a similar combination, advantageous to both countries and favourable to the best interests of the whole world.—Mr. Kamensky (London agent of the Russian Ministry of Finance) dwelt with satisfaction on the fact that prejudices were decreasing and commercial international relations were increasing between all peoples and countries. When he first came to London, many years ago, and was looking out for houses, the owner of one of them said he would never let his house to a foreigner, a rather sweeping prejudice.—Mr. O'Dwyer said, in a humorous speech, that having just returned from Russia and the East, he was of opinion that useless formalities about passports, &c., a superabundance of holidays, and a lack of order and accuracy in the people, were the impediments which prevented the more rapid development of business and other useful undertakings.—Mr. Kinloch considered that there was a want of commercial travellers who understood Russian, and knew how to study and satisfy the requirements and wishes of Russian customers. Germans managed these matters better than we did.

FINE ART.

EXPLORATIONS IN EASTERN CRETE.

I.—A MYCENAEAN DEDICATION.

Ashmolean Museum, Oxford: June 1, 1896.

IN spite of the insurrectionary movement in Crete, the tranquillity then prevailing in the eastern provinces enabled me to devote this spring to the more thorough investigation of their early remains. The experiences of two former journeys had convinced me that much in the way of Mycenaean settlements still remained to be discovered in the Diktaean region, and I was also impelled by the hope of finding new evidences of a pre-Phoenician system of writing. But the results of the present exploration have in both respects surpassed my most sanguine hopes.

The early Cretan script claims a priority of interest. Of the primitive class of three-sided bead seals presenting on each face pictographic designs, singly or in groups, I secured or obtained impressions of fifteen fresh examples. Several of these clearly indicated the profession or occupation of the owner of the seal—often, it would seem, possessor of flocks and herds. In two cases—from Elunda (Olons) and Mallia—primitive representations of ships—one of a new type with only a foresail—attest the seafaring character of the early population, further borne out by the occurrence of fishes on other seals. In one instance there seemed to be an allusion to the potter's craft. I also saw an exceptionally large and somewhat rudely shaped specimen of this early class, with more linear representations of a man, a quadruped, and other indeterminate objects or symbols, found by Dr. A. Taramelli, a young Italian archaeologist, in the possession of a peasant at Kalochorio in Peleada, and since acquired for the Museum of the Syllogos at Candia.

All these more primitive seals, which, as a class, certainly belong to the pre-Mycenaean period of Cretan culture, were of steatite or "soapstone"; and, following up a clue supplied to me by Dr. Hadzidakis at Candia, I was able to ascertain the existence of large deposits of this material in the island. In the valley of the Sarakina stream, about an hour below the site of the ancient Malla, I saw large masses of it in situ; and I subsequently obtained information of equally prolific beds on the coast at the Kakon Oros, a little west of Arvi, and in the range between Sudzuro and Kastelliana, within the territory, that is, of the ancient Priasos. This geological fact is of primary importance in the history of early Cretan and Aegean culture. The abundance of this attractive, and at the same time easily workable, material explains the general diffusion of the taste for wearing engraved seals and ornaments among a comparatively primitive population. It was thus that at a very early date the Cretan craftsmen were already enabled to practise the elements of the glyptic art, and to evolve the rudiments of many of the traditional designs which were transferred during the later Mycenaean age to harder materials, such as agate, cornelian, and chalcedony. In the same way the development of a system of script by the grouping of conventional pictographs upon the seals was greatly facilitated, while in another direction the more opaque qualities of steatite gave the Cretan workmen the means of copying, at a comparatively small expenditure of labour, Egyptian stone vases executed in much harder materials.

It is to the succeeding Mycenaean period, when the earlier steatite seals were for the most part superseded by intaglios in harder stones, that the more conventionalised class of Cretan pictographic characters unquestionably belongs. In this category my recent investigations have brought to light a new class of seals, curiously modern in shape, of which I obtained specimens cut out of green jasper and cornelian, from Mycenaean sites in the Eparchies of Siteia and Girapetra. This type of seal presents a distinct analogy to certain Hittite forms; and therefore it was the more interesting to find one with four Cretan characters symmetrically arranged, one of which, the goat's head, is common to the Hittite system. Another specimen, exquisitely engraved in red cornelian, exhibited within an elegant quatrefoil border a wolf's head with protruding tongue—again a symbol which occurs among the Hittite characters. Its solitary occurrence on the Cretan seal is of importance as showing that it had an independent value. In connexion with these may be mentioned another seal found at Priasos, of the same form as the above, but presenting a purely pictorial design in the Mycenaean style—two wild goats raising themselves against a pile of rocks to browse on the overhanging branches. Of much ruder type, though belonging, perhaps, to the same period, is a seal from a prehistoric akropolis at Kalamafka, consisting of what seems little more than a natural finger-shaped piece of steatite, with a group of three characters arranged perpendicularly on its oval base. I was also able to obtain the impression of a four-sided seal-stone from Siteia, containing three groups of three characters each and one of four. The special interest of this stone is that it affords a new link with the pre-Mycenaean class of pictographic seals, the inscription being headed—as on so many examples of the more primitive class—by a seated figure of a man, no doubt the owner of the seal. Six of the symbols on this remarkable stone are new to the Cretan system. There further came to me from Gortyna a white cornelian bead-seal of the rare class presenting a convoluted back, on the face of which, above a lion's head, are two characters, which recur in the same collocation on a four-sided stone from Crete, now in the Berlin Museum (Cretan Pictographs, &c., fig. 34d., 2 and 3 from 1.). A fragment of a Mycenaean pthos from the akropolis of Keraton exhibits a graffito sign of the linear class; and two characters identical with the Cypriote ko and e appear on each side of a central design, representing two sprays and a dart or arrow, on a dark steatite lentoid gem, apparently of very early Mycenaean fabric, procured by me from the site of Knösos.

Hitherto, with such exceptions as the more or less isolated signs on the gypsum blocks of the prehistoric building at Knösos, the evidence of the early Cretan script has been confined to the seal-stones and graffiti on vases. This time, however, a discovery awaited me surpassing in interest and importance all previous finds of this nature. The scene of this discovery was the great Cave of Psychrò, on Mount Lasethi, the Diktation Antron of the Lyttians, and the mythical birthplace of the Cretan Zeus, which, from the abundance of votive relics it contains, must have been the scene of a very ancient cult. These remains, first described by Prof. Halbherr, belong almost exclusively to Mycenaean times, though during my last year's visit to Psychrò, in company with Mr. J. L. Myres (see ACADEMY, 1895, June 1, p. 469), we saw one fragment of later sculpture. On that occasion I was able to assist at a small excavation which produced a variety of prehistoric relics. Among the excavators was a youth, who shortly before my return to the spot last April, and in anticipation of it, dug down to the stone floor of the cave in the lowest level of its great entrance chamber. On my arrival he showed me several clay bulls and figures of the usual Mycenaean class, obtained through his dig, together with several plain terra-cotta cups of a kind which I had myself recently observed in the Mycenaean tholoi of a neighbouring site, as also within the temenos of what was probably the traditional "Tomb of Zeus" on the summit of Mount Juktas. As a matter of comparatively minor importance, he added that he and a friend who had helped in the excavation had also found a broken stone "with writing" at the bottom of the earth layer. Naturally, I lost no time in securing the stone, and found it to be a dark steatite fragment, bearing part of an inscription clearly cut in characters about an inch high, arranged in a single line, belonging to the same Mycenaean script as that of the seal-stones and of a type representing the linearisation of originally pictographic characters. There are in all nine letters, with probably syllabic values, remaining—apparently about half the original number—and two punctuations. At the right extremity a smaller sign is placed above that in the line below. Among the characters is observable an elongated form of the four-barred-gate symbol (Pictographs, &c., No. 24), part of the S-like figure (No. 69b), and two fish-like signs (No. 34), which here occur together, just as on a ring-stone (Pictographs, fig. 39) they follow one another, one at the end and one at the beginning of two lines. The other forms seem to be new. That we have here to deal with a regular inscription no human being will doubt. The fragment itself appears to form part of a kind of table of offerings of quadrangular form, and originally provided with four short legs and central stem, while above are parts of two cup-shaped hollows with raised rims, of which there had apparently been three when the table was complete. By a singular coincidence I was able subsequently to obtain from a prehistoric site at Arvi, on the south coast of Crete, where several steatite vessels of Mycenaean and earlier dates had already been discovered, a parallel object of the same material, in this case perfect, but presenting only one cup-shaped receptacle and without inscription.

On securing this highly interesting relic I at once arranged to continue the excavation, in the hopes of finding the remaining portion; but though we dug down to the rock surface for some square metres round, nothing more of it could be discovered. I was able, however, to ascertain the fact that, above the level where the inscribed fragment lay, was an apparently undisturbed layer containing quantities of unbroken cups of Mycenaean date, and tending, therefore, to show that the broken "table of offerings" had reached the position in which it was found—at a depth, namely, of two metres, and actually resting on the stone floor of the cave—before the close of the Mycenaean period. At about the same level I found a head of a votive clay bull of better fabric than is usual in the Cretan cave deposits. The breakage of the "table of offerings" was itself, in all probability, due to the fall of some rock from the roof of the cavern, the floor of which is now, for the most part, one vast ruin heap.

It is natural to bring the steatite table, with its cup-shaped receptacles, into relation with the ancient cult of which this cave was once the centre in prehistoric times, if we may judge by the extensive deposits of figures of men and animals, both in bronze and clay, as well as of votive double axes and weapons. None of these remains belong to the classical period. The votive deposit, indeed, seems to be purely prehistoric; and one of the bronze male figures round supplies a representation of Mycenaean clothing and method of wearing the hair identical with that of the men on the Vaphio gold cups. It cannot be doubted that the broken "table of offerings" belongs to the same period as the relics among which it was imbedded, and the inscribed characters must in all probability be regarded as forming part of a Mycenaean dedication.

Here, then, on European soil, in a sanctuary historically Greek, we have a formal inscription dating, at a moderate computation, some six centuries earlier than the earliest Hellenic writing known to us, and at least three centuries older than the earliest Phœnician. The fact is the more interesting since, during the period to which this specimen of prehistoric script must be referred, the Syrian Semites, as we know from the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, were in the full use of the cuneiform characters.

ARTHUR J. EVANS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE following exhibitions will open next week: a collection of pictures by Mr. J. J. Shannon, at the Fine Art Society's; water-colours by members of the Dudley Gallery Art Society, at the Egyptian Hall; Caucasian Sketches, by Mr. A. D. McCormick, in the rooms of the Alpine Club, Savile-row; and a special loan exhibition of English furniture and silks of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, together with Sir A. Wollaston Franks's loan collection of European porcelain, at the Bethnal Green Museum.

THE private view of the summer exhibition of studies and sketches by members of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours is fixed for Tuesday next.

MESSRS. DOULTON & Co. have now on view, in their show-rooms on the Albert Embankment, a new series of terra-cotta panels, executed by Mr. George Tinworth. With exception of one or two portraits, they all represent scenes from the Bible story.

THERE has been brought together, in the rooms of the Society of Antiquaries, Burlington House, a unique collection of English medieval paintings and illuminated MSS., which will remain on view until Saturday next.

SINCE his return to England, Mr. Whistler has devoted much of his time to a new series of lithographs of London and district, one of which—a view of the Thames looking towards Westminster—will be among the supplements to the first part of the new volume of The Studio, due about the middle of June.

A NEW series of cartoons by Mr. F. C. Gould, the well-known caricaturist, will be issued from the office of the Westminster Gazette in a few days. This series will be uniform with "Cartoons of the Campaign," and will deal with the first ten months of the present Government, including the American, South African, and Egyptian crises, as well as the more important domestic events which have occurred during that time.

THE Washington Ex Libris Society is about to issue a new illustrated quarterly journal, for which Mr. Elliot Stock has been appointed agent in England.

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies, to receive the report of the council and to elect the officers, will be held, at 22, Albemarle-street, on Monday next, at 5 p.m. Prof. Jebb, president of the society, is unfortunately prevented by illness from taking the chair; but his place will be filled by one of the vice-presidents, Sir E. Maunde Thompson, principal librarian of the British Museum.

ON Monday next, Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale, which will last altogether for eight days, of what is described as the first portion of the collection of Greek coins, formed by the late Sir Edward Herbert Bunbury. If it does not equal the Montagu cabinet in the extraordinary beauty and rarity of individual pieces, it may fairly be said to be unrivalled in the historical importance of many of its series; for Sir Edward collected, during his long life, not so much as a numismatist, as to illustrate the history and geography of the ancient world. The catalogue is illustrated with eight autotype plates.

THE STAGE.

MISS OLGA NETHERSOLE'S CARMEN.

THE short season of Miss Olga Nethersole at the Gaiety is to show her, fortunately, in "Denise" as well as in "Carmen." We say "fortunately" because it is certain that, though in "Carmen" she is to be admired, there are opportunities for subtler and more touching art in the play by Dumas. Mr. Henry Hamilton's adaptation of the story of Marimée, known to all the world through the captivating music of Bizet, met with a doubtful reception on Saturday night: that is to say, the house was sharply divided—there were those who recognised the power and the abundance of Miss Nethersole's art; and there were those, too, who very much, and, as we think, somewhat unjustly, resented the actress's materialisation of a character over which a veil of operatic sentiment has been wont to be thrown. So far as our own little experience goes—we saw the opera not long ago at Drury Lane, when the charm and merit of Miss Jessie Huddleston as Micaela seemed to us to efface the impression created by the Carmen—Carmen, on the musical stage, is practically without character: is, practically, but a picturesquely arrayed person who is the vehicle for entrancing strains.

Now, whatever the offences of the Carmen of Miss Nethersole, even its most violent opponent cannot say that it is characterless. It is full of vividness; and alike on its broadest lines and in its every detail, it abounds in truth to a particular conception. That conception is unwelcome to many. For our own part, we consider that it is essentially right. The woman, as Miss Nethersole presents her, is said to abound in solicitation, but to want charm! Charm for whom? We do not imagine that any one of Carmen's admirers would have been seduced by the spirituelle. What might have led them captive for a while—but they would have returned from their captivity after a certain term, no doubt—is her physique, and yet more than her physique, her fervour, earnestness, and strange luxurious Southern nature. That Southern nature Miss Nethersole, during the two hours' traffic of the stage, adopts most absolutely. It becomes her own. Hence the source of her power. This is no heroine subjected to ordinary rules of conduct, or needlessly remorseful after venial breaches of the code of propriety. She is irresponsible, and she is pleasure-loving. She is entirely careless—a fatalist, yet with a will of her own; a savage, yet with wiles; a wily creature, yet genuinely and profoundly moved. It is a long time since we have seen, upon the English stage, an impersonation so distinct and potent of a heroine of a type so pronounced. And, as has been said already, many people do not like it. It remains, nevertheless, both vigorous and reasonable. The resources of Miss Nethersole are remarkable. The lighter and more passionate sides of the character—its gaiety and devilry, its vehemence and luxury—are alike presented with extreme skill. The death-scene, though an ingenious study of dissolution, is probably undesirable. But in the remarkable third act—or, in reality, it is the second tableau of the second act, but is more conveniently spoken of as the third—nothing is done that we cannot approve of: nay, more, nothing is done that does not contribute to, the revelation of the character.

"Carmen," as Miss Nethersole presents it in Mr. Hamilton's adaptation, is to a great extent a one-part piece, and in that respect, of course, imperfect. Mr. Charles Dalton and Mr. Kingston, and other doubtless qualified actors, have little opportunity of distinguishing themselves. Miss Alexis Leighton has one short scene in which she can be effective, and she does not miss her opportunity. And Miss Lena Ashwell is a character yet more sympathetic, speaks with admirable conviction, and comports herself with an appropriate tenderness. The piece cannot run long in London. It may be, even, that a public which, in the case of adaptations of popular English tales, does not reject inanity and is indulgent to incompetence, will pronounce against the representation decisively, and so make its short career yet shorter. That remains to be seen. But, meanwhile, we shall allow ourselves to register the occurrence of a remarkable performance of Miss Nethersole's—a performance full of artistic continuity and of singular force and skill. F. W.

STAGE NOTES.

We went last Tuesday to hear one of the very best Shakesperian readers extant—Mr. J. H. Leigh, who gave us, at the Steinway Hall, his wisely made abridgment of "Julius Caesar," which we are glad to see that he has had printed, for convenience of reference. The abridgment is "wisely made": first, because it is sagacious in detail; and secondly, on general grounds, it would be a mistake—and a mistake that is made often—to attempt, under the different conditions of the platform, what was intended for the stage. Mr. Leigh recognises that a reading of two hours and a quarter, embracing, not indeed quite all, but everything that one is accustomed to hear at the theatre, would bore people. His reading lasts an hour and a half. He fatigues neither his audience nor himself, and he presents adequately the essence of the drama. The method of Mr. Leigh's reading appears to us as admirable as is the discretion of his choice. He never behaves as if he were upon the stage; he accepts the conditions of the platform; he does not seek to differentiate the personality of every separate character when the utterance is, after all, the utterance of one. In other words, he is dramatic within reasonable bounds. His performance is controlled by alert and high intelligence, and his exposition gains by his full employment of the not inconsiderable physical gifts which Nature has placed at his disposal. His reading of "Julius Caesar" was, indeed, a distinct treat. We should like some day to hear Mr. Leigh in a performance which, we are told, he makes fully as remarkable—his rendering of "Richard the Third."

MUSIC.

RECENT CONCERTS.

Mlle. MARIE WEINGÄRTNER, pupil of M. Delaborde at the Paris Conservatoire, gave a pianoforte recital at the Steinway Hall last Thursday week. She commenced with Bach's great organ Fugue in A minor. The lady is young, and, moreover, a pupil; she is intelligent, and certainly ought to find out one day that organ music is ineffective on the pianoforte. To this matter we are constantly referring; but pianists are constantly sinning; and like the widow in the parable, we hope to worry until we win—that is, until we have stamped out the transcription disease. Though the choice of piece was unsuitable, Mlle. Weingärtner performed it with marked intelligence, clean technique, and most sympathetic touch. This was followed by Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), in which, fortunately, the pianist did not quite satisfy us. Had she done so, it would have been a case of an old head on young shoulders. Mlle. Weingärtner is young in thought and feeling; and this could be felt in her rendering, in many respects admirable, of the music. She will, of course, soon pay us another visit.

On Saturday afternoon Señor Sarasate and M. Ysaye were giving concerts—the one at St. James's, the other at the Queen's Hall. The programme of the latter was the more attractive, but we had noticed the Belgian violinist last week; and, further, Señor Sarasate brought with him a new pianist, Dr. Otto Neitzel, of Cologne, who gave some recitals last year at the Steinway Hall. His appearance in conjunction with the Spanish violinist, however, gives greater prominence to his name. The programme opened with Bach's fine Sonata in B minor for violin and pianoforte. A finished, intelligent reading of the music was given; yet Señor Sarasate, whether by taste or temperament, or perhaps from a mixture of both, does not succeed in bringing out its highest qualities: he displays grace rather than nobility, sweetness rather than severity. Raff's Sonata in A minor was played with taste and brilliancy by both artists. Señor Sarasate played Wrenawski's charming "Legende" in most winning fashion, and then, in some showy pieces, proved that his hand, or shall we say hands, are as skilful as ever; and also, if we may judge from the applause, that tours de force attract the public more than music which has to be searched before it can be thoroughly understood. Dr. Neitzel gave as solos a Chopin Nocturne and Liszt's Ballade in B minor: they were neatly rendered, the second brilliantly. This week, however, the pianist will play Schumann's "Carneval," and that will offer us a better idea of his powers. The Liszt "Ballade" which he selected has some beautiful Chopin-like passages in it; but the composer, here as elsewhere, sinks at times to a very commonplace level.

On Monday afternoon Mme. A. Svetlofsky gave a concert at St. James's Hall. The programme consisted chiefly of Russian music. With the names of the composers we are familiar, but all the songs by which they were represented were said to be sung for the first time in England. An Andante from Glinka's opera, "Russian and Ludmilla," and a song from Rubinstein's Biblical opera, "Die Maccabäer," proved interesting even with pianoforte accompaniment. From such small samples it is, of course, impossible to judge of the works: they serve, however, to remind us of a school of composers of whom we have as yet only imperfect knowledge. A characteristic "Variations Ballade" by Scriabin, and a quaint song by Borodin also deserve mention. Mme. Svetlofsky sang with much fervour and dramatic instinct: she deserves the thanks of musicians for her interesting programme. The concert commenced with Arensky's pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 32), a clever and graceful work—one, however, in which colouring and ornamentation strike one as more interesting than subject-matter. It was well performed by Mlle. Sethe (a sympathetic leader), Mr. Herbert Parsons, and Mr. Herbert Walenn.

In the evening, at the same Hall, Dr. Richter opened his concert with Tchaikowsky's Overture to Shakspeare's "Romeo and Juliet," a work produced nearly twenty years ago at the Crystal Palace. The music is highly interesting, and yet it appears to have been laid aside until last Monday. It is quite possible to trace a connexion between certain sections of the Overture and certain features of the drama; and yet the limits of programme music have not been at all strained. The solemn opening movement, the agitated principal theme, and the broad, dignified melody which serves as "second subject proper," are all submitted to ample and skilful development; while the orchestration throughout is highly effective. The performance was exceedingly fine. The interest in the Russian composer's music has materially increased since his death, or rather, we would say, since the production of his noble last Symphony. Perhaps one day we shall hear "Manfred" or "Hamlet." Dvorik's fine Overture "Otello" and the "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" received full justice at the hands of the great conductor. The concert concluded with Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

Mr. E. D'Albert brought his remarkable series of recitals to a close on Tuesday afternoon. His first piece was Beethoven's Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), the longest, the most difficult, and, consequently, the most seldom performed of the Sonatas. The first three movements are magnificent; the closing Fugue, however, is little less than a torture to listen to. It is clever, and will repay study: it is terribly difficult, and makes excellent practice, but it is undeniably dry. The earlier movements were interpreted with power, dignity, and feeling; in the Fugue the pianist did all that swiftness and strength could do, yet to little purpose. He played also Schumann's Sonata in G minor. The pianist's conception of the music was thoroughly good, though he was at times a little too vehement. M. D'Albert is one of the foremost players of the day, though, as we have already remarked, intelligence and skill prevail, with some notable exceptions, over emotion. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW NOVELS

DAFFODIL LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS,

GRANT ALLEN'S SENSATIONAL STORY, THE JAWS OF DEATH.

12mo, cloth gilt, 2s.; Paper covers, 1s. 6d.

"The Jaws of Death" is a pretty piece of writing in the sensational line. It is cleverly told somewhat on the lines laid down by Poe when he undertook to show how to write a Blackwood tale. We are brought so smoothly, so gradually, to the very edge of the catastrophe the shiver of it is upon us almost before we are there. It is extremely creditable to Mr. Allen's invention.—"Daily Chronicle."
"We have greater novelists than Mr. Allen, but none who better understand the weaving of plot and the invaluable art of sustaining interest. 'The Jaws of Death' is a highly characteristic piece of work and will afford as fascinating a half-hour's reading as any one is likely to get this season."—"Publishers' Circular."

NOW READY, FIRST VOLUME in
BY A NEW AUTHOR, entitled
DUST IN THE BALANCE.

By GEORGE KNIGHT.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

With Title-page and cover design by Laurence Housman.

"The style is smooth and succinct; the sentiment human and genuine; and altogether this is in its kind one of the best sets of short sketches that have recently been published."—"Scotsman."
"Mr. Knight has published a varied series of studies, each of which is marked by strong individuality and great charm."—"Star."

THE POWER of the DOG. An Entirely New Novel. By ROWLAND GREY, Author of "In Sunny Switzerland," "By Virtue of his Office," "Linden-Blumen," "Chris." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"One of the most charming stories recently published is Mr. Rowland Grey's new novel 'The Power of the Dog.' The book is full of the mysterious workings of the human heart finely true, yet delicate withal."—"Star."
"In his treatment of character the author is essentially right; he never makes a false touch. We congratulate Mr. Grey on his story, and we congratulate him even more upon his title. It is strikingly original."—"Daily Chronicle."

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER- PAD.

(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 3s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL MANUALS.

Edited by GEORGE P. GOULD, M.A.

"Such a series of books is imperatively needed. We strongly urge our ministers and teachers to utilise it to the utmost."—"Baptist Magazine."

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY. HISTORY OF THE FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND. FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,
By CHARLES S. MIAL.

Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pages, cloth, 6s., post free.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

MR. LESLIE STEPHEN'S NEW BOOK.—2 vols., 9s. SOCIAL RIGHTS and DUTIES.

"Nothing which Mr. Leslie Stephen has given to the world is better fitted to contribute to clear thinking on subjects of urgent importance, or worthy to exhibit the strong and subtle dialectic and trenchant style of the most serious critic and one of the most powerful minds of this generation."—Dr. MARCUS DODS in the Bookman. "There are few living writers whose style is more delightful, more easy, and full of charm than Mr. Leslie Stephen. Even in grave subjects his dry humour is constantly cropping up, his argument is relieved by graceful illustration, by historical allusion, by literary skill, and by apt homely references to everyday matters."—Daily Chronicle.

By LIEUT.-COL. P. H. DALBIAC, M.P.
DICTIONARY of QUOTATIONS (English). 528 pp., including Authors and Copious Subjects Indexes, 7s. 6d. (1) All quotations direct from original Authors; (2) the best editions invariably used; (3) full references to the "chapter and verse" of all quotations.

"An improvement upon Bartlett's and other well-known works in that it draws largely from recent and living authors."—Times. "The work stands all ordinary tests, and the fulness and accuracy of its references makes it worthy of a place in every library where scholarship is valued."—Scotsman.

FATHER DOLLING'S BOOK. [Just ready.] TEN YEARS in a PORTSMOUTH SLUM. By the Rev. R. R. DOLLING, late Priest-in-Charge of St. Agatha's Mission, Winchester College Mission. Containing the full Correspondence with the Bishop of Winchester. With 18 Full-page Plates, 6s.

PARTS of the PACIFIC. Illustrated by the Author and from Photographs. 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"We have not had a book in our hands for many a day in which we had marked so many passages for quotation. Plenty of adventures by flood and field are to be found in this delightful book."—Daily Chronicle. "A really entertaining travel book. Its author modestly calls himself 'A Peripatetic Parson.' His wandering habits have not, however, robbed him of a most excellent gift of humour. The book is as informing as it is entertaining."—York Post. "We have not lately read a book of travels more lively and entertaining."—Manchester Guardian.

LITERATURE.

The Heart of a Continent: a Narrative of Travels in Manchuria, across the Gobi Desert, through the Himalayas, the Pamirs, and Chitral, 1884-94. By Capt. Frank E. Younghusband. (John Murray.)

No name has been more prominently before the public during the last decade of Asiatic geographical research than that of Capt. Younghusband, who claims to have inherited his passion for travel from his mother, sister of Robert Shaw, the first Englishman known to have penetrated from India over the Himalayas to Eastern Turkestan. Whatever value physiologists may be disposed to attach to this claim, there can be no doubt that his first incentive to become a wanderer over Central Asia was derived from the memories and records of Robert Shaw himself, whose papers and native assistants the author, then a subaltern in the King's Dragoon Guards, had an opportunity of consulting, in 1884, at his uncle's former headquarters, the Punjab hill station of Dharmasala. Since then he has been almost incessantly on the move; and although many of his journeys follow beaten tracks, there remains a very large residuum of original exploration (including some achievements of capital importance), which more than justifies a detailed account of all his Asiatic travels in a single volume.

Capt. Younghusband began his ramblings with a visit in 1886 to the Long White Mountain, Manchuria, in company with Mr. H. E. M. James, whose book describing that brilliant exploit was reviewed in the ACADEMY for May 5, 1886. On his return to Peking, he obtained an extension of leave, for the purpose of accompanying Col. Bell in a journey from North China across the continent to India. This journey was successfully carried out by both explorers, but (fortunately for the enlargement of our knowledge of Central Asia) by different routes, at least as far as Hami on the northern verge of the Gobi. Here they had appointed to meet, Col. Bell taking the more familiar southern road inside the Great Wall and through the province of Kansu, while Capt. Younghusband proceeded through the Kalgan Gate to Kwei-hwa-cheng, and thence by quite a new track across the desert to the trysting-place. He reached Hami, some 2000 miles west by north of Peking, just a month after Col. Bell, who enjoys the reputation of being the most expeditious of modern travellers, and who, after waiting a day, continued his journey to India alone. But the delay, which, in any case, was readily explained by the unforeseen difficulties of the new route, was amply repaid by the important geographical work executed by the author in this hitherto little-known section of the Gobi. Here his track, crossing that of Przevalsky at the Borstun Well, skirted the southern slope of the Hurka Hills for 200 miles; and a good opportunity was thus afforded of determining the true character of this range, which was found to constitute a south-easterly extension of the Altai and not of the Tian-Shan mountains, as had hitherto been supposed. By this determination much light has been thrown on the mutual relations of the great Central Asian orographic systems; and we now know that the Tian-Shan, instead of extending indefinitely eastwards, really terminates at the so-called Zungarian Strait, a little to the east of Hami.

Of course, all this region, from the great bend of the Hoang-ho to Zungaria, forms geographically an essential part of Mongolia, and is popularly supposed to be occupied, wherever habitable, by restless Mongol nomads. But this is no longer so; and Capt. Younghusband found that, as in Manchuria, most of the arable, and even of the pasture, lands have already been inundated by the rising stream of Chinese peasantry, who are everywhere overflowing beyond the Great Wall into the old Mongolo-Tatar domain.

"Kwei-hwa-cheng used originally to be a Mongol town. It is even now included in Mongolia, and there is a Mongol prince resident in the place; but no one would believe that it was not Chinese, for it is occupied almost exclusively by Chinamen, and the Mongols are relegated to the outskirts" (p. 73).

But while the Manchu and Mongol branches of the family are thus threatened with extinction, a better fate seems reserved for the hardier Turki group, whose territory was reached by our traveller soon after leaving Hami. Although the contrast between the two races was at once obvious, he nevertheless noticed as he advanced westwards

"a gradual, scarcely perceptible, change from the round of a Mongolian type to a sharper, and yet more sharp, type of feature. Whether this is accidental, or whether it is brought about by the commingling of separate races, I know not; but I think I am not wrong in stating that, the further east one goes, the rounder and broader are the faces of the inhabitants, and the further west one goes the longer and narrower they become" (p. 118).

This remark is perfectly correct, and is all the more valuable as coming from an observer indifferent to anthropological theories. The phenomenon may be witnessed, roughly speaking, all the way from the Aegean to the Pacific; and the explanation, as always maintained by the present writer,* would appear to be, not that the Turk was originally an "Allophylian white" later crossed in diverse proportions by Mongol blood, but that he was originally of Mongol stock, later crossed in diverse proportions by Caucasian (white) blood. This is one of those cases in which the physical arguments being balanced, the last appeal must be to speech; and it seems most reasonable to hold that the Turki group of Mongolo-Tatar speech have been partly assimilated by miscegenation to the Caucasian type, unless it can be shown that their Mongolo-Tatar speech is acquired and not original. But of this there is not only no evidence, but what evidence exists is all the other way. For the present, therefore, the Turks must be grouped with the Magyars, who, although now not differing perceptibly from the average European, are historically known to have formerly been of Finno-Tatar (Ugrian) type, as they still are of Finno-Tatar speech.

From Hami round the Tarim basin (Kashgaria) to the foot of the Himalayas, Capt. Younghusband followed the familiar Tian-shan Nan-lu ("Southern Tian-shan route"), consequently this section of his journey presents no features calling for special comment. But the last section across the Mustagh Pass to Kashmir in the early winter of 1887, together with his subsequent explorations of the same Alpine region in 1889, will always rank as one of the most brilliant geographical achievements of our times. The Old Mustagh Pass proving quite impracticable (it has, in fact, been for many years entirely abandoned by the natives), the New Pass, a little farther west, was attacked, and successfully surmounted at an altitude of nearly 19,000 feet, with no special appliances for mountain climbing, and at a period of the year when all traffic is suspended between the opposite slopes of those lofty ranges. When the highest point had been scaled the chief difficulty still remained, for the party now found themselves landed on the brink of a precipice apparently barring all further progress.

"The cliff we had now to descend was an almost sheer precipice; its only saving feature was that it was rough and rugged, and so afforded some little hold for our hands and feet. Yet even then we seldom got a hold for the whole hand or whole foot. All we generally found was a little ledge, upon which we could grip with the tips of our fingers or side of the foot. The men were most good to me, whenever possible guiding my foot into some secure hold, and often supporting it there with their hands; but at times it was all I could do to summon sufficient courage to let myself down on to the veriest little crevices which had to support me. There was a constant dread, too, that fragments of these ledges might give way with the weight upon them; for the rock was crumbly, as it generally is when exposed to severe frosts; and once I heard a shout from above, as a huge piece of rock which had been detached came crashing past me and as nearly as possible hit two of the men who had already got half way down" (p. 198).

During the explorations of 1887 and 1889 in this north-western section of the Himalayas, our traveller made several important discoveries and determinations: such as the position of the Shimahal Pass and river leading into the Hunza (Kanjut) district, the course of the glacial Oprang stream, one of the head waters of the Yarkand-darya, and the trend of the hitherto unknown Aghil Range, which lies between, and runs parallel with, the Kuen-lun and the Karakorum, or, as he prefers to call it, the Mustagh Range. These discoveries, for which he has well earned the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society, have since been supplemented by * See article "Turkomans," Nature, December 4, 1879; and Ethnology, 1896, pp. 311-313.

Sir William Conway's surveys amid the Hispar and Baltoro glaciers, so that little now remains to be done in the intricate Alpine region where converge the Himalayan, Kuen-lun, and Hindu-Kush orographic systems.

The excursion of 1889, the account of which forms one of the most interesting sections of the book, was undertaken for the purpose of interviewing the lawless Hunza tribes, who have since been reduced to order, and now vie with the Sikhs and Gurkhas in their loyalty to the British Ráj. It will be remembered that they co-operated effectively with Capt. Kelly's column advancing from Kashmir during the recent campaign in Chitral; and this astonishing transformation must be largely credited to Capt. Younghusband's diplomacy, followed by Col. Durand's energetic action during the expedition of 1892.

After the Hunza expedition, during which half a dozen passes were crossed at heights ranging from over 17,000 to nearly 19,000 feet, other excursions were made back to Kashgaria, round the Pamirs, and lastly to Chitral again on diplomatic service to the Mehtar, Nizám-ú-Mulk. It was the murder of this ruler by his half-brother early in 1895 that led to the British occupation and the absorption of Chitral in the Indian political system.

The work, which, although not written by a specialist in any department, abounds in instructive matter in almost every branch of geographical and ethnological lore, concludes with two highly suggestive chapters on "the Missionary Question in China," and "Impressions of Travel." It is well, though somewhat sparingly, illustrated, and supplied with several useful maps and an index, which last might with advantage have been three or four times longer.

"THE NEW IRISH LIBRARY."—Swift in Ireland. By R. Ashe King. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is a little book, and in censuring its faults one feels that sort of restraint which checks one's natural impulse to hit a small boy who deserves punishment. But though a little book, the subject of it is so great that it merits great treatment; and, at least, the writer might have borne in mind Swift's own terse but invaluable definition of style: "the right word in the right place," not by any means so "bald" a dictum as Mr. King thinks it.

Readers of Thackeray's English Humorists will remember how that writer, knowing that some might object to the inclusion of Swift among his coterie, on the grounds that Swift was an Irishman, was at pains to explain that, although, through an accident of birth, Swift was born in Ireland, he was, on both sides of his family, as pure-bred an Englishman as ever existed. Swift's friend Pope had long before expressed the same idea in a rhyme, perhaps a quiet satire on Swift's pet aversion to be called an Irishman:

"Jonathan Swift
Had the gift
By fatherage, motherage,
And by brotherage,
To come from Gotheridge."

Swift in one of his deplorable ebullitions of bitterness had repudiated his right to be considered an Irishman. "I happened to be dropped here" (in Ireland) he confesses, "and to my sorrow did not die before I came back to it." Mr. King might have again told us that Swift was, strictly speaking, an Englishman and not an Irishman, but, in his zeal to settle the point beyond question, he is a trifle too emphatic when he writes:

"Swift drew his first breath and his last in Ireland, spent in her the best years of his youth and of his maturity, owed her his literary education, and paid her with a political education by which she has never ceased to profit to this day; but in no sense was he an Irishman."

It will be noticed that in the above remarkable statement three or four facts are set out, in reference to any one of which Swift might be considered an Irishman, in a certain restricted sense, while in the end we are told that "in no sense was he an Irishman." Here, clearly, we do not find "the right word in the right place." If Swift had been "dropped," to use his own word, at the equator; if his mother had been a Hottentot and his father a Chinaman; if he had never made a joke, or been "agin the Government," and had died at the North Pole, then the unequivocal and direct "no" would have been the right word in the right place.

A very little more attention to that neglected thing style, a very little more of what poor Robert Louis Stevenson called "elbow grease," a trifle less egotism, and the book might have been on the same level of excellence as the Swift of Mr. Leslie Stephen or the Steele of Mr. Austin Dobson. And there is no reason why a volume of "The New Irish Library" should not equal any of the English series of similar books, if the writers would only pursue the one road—for there is no royal one—to literary fame.

As for the printing of the book, we must implore the editor or the "reader" of this series to mend his ways. The punctuation is a fortuitous concurrence of commas, and the misprints beyond all calculation.

A small biography, like that under consideration, is deprived of half its usefulness, if the author never refers the reader to a single source of fuller information. In this book there are no references whatsoever to any of Swift's modern biographers; but the older ones, from Orrery to Thackeray, are mentioned for the purpose of contradicting mis-statements which have long ago been set right. Such references are worse than useless—they are positively misleading.

For some reason or other, Mr. King will have it that Thackeray, in his Lectures, deliberately elandered Swift. Thackeray was, we are told, "blinded by political partisanship." A more unfounded statement was, I would venture to say, never made; for who devoted less of his time to politics than did our noble-minded cynic? One has only to look at the bulk of Thackeray's literary labours, and to think how comparatively short his life was, to know how little thought he must have given to politics. But granted that he did differ politically from Swift, why therefore should he treat a political opponent of a past generation unjustly? Thackeray did not like Swift, because Swift has written things too vile for any one of ordinary taste to tolerate. There is no getting over this fact. He judged Swift by his own writings and by the biographies of him which existed when the lectures on "English Humorists" were delivered. At that time the interdependence between a man's character and his bodily health was not so well recognised as in the present day, and Swift's disagreeable points of character were far less likely to be excused. If Thackeray had been fortunate enough to have had access to Forster's Life of Swift, to Dr. Wilde's study of him from a medical point of view, to Dr. Bucknill's paper in Brain for January, 1882, and to Mr. Henry Craik's recent addition to our knowledge, his opinions about Swift would have been quite different.

Thackeray is called by Mr. King "an old Scotchwoman," because he did not admire a very poor jest about the Anglican Church from the pen of one of her priests. He is accused also of "shallowness and woodenness." But although Thackeray's knowledge of Swift's life was imperfect, and his ignorance of the Irish Question led him into a most egregious blunder as to the meaning of Swift's "modest proposal," he was able to grasp the magnitude of Swift's mind with the instinct of true genius, which is far better than mere knowledge. The extent of Thackeray's admiration for Swift shows itself again and again. If Mr. King had only read carefully through the Lecture, he never would have fallen into the mistake of attributing to Thackeray ignorance of facts which Thackeray actually notices a page beyond where his censor left off.

"Why," says Mr. King, "if Thackeray knew anything of Swift's life, he must have known that this hypocrite stole off daily to morning prayers when at the height of his power in London: that he read prayers daily to his servants so unostentatiously that Delany was six months in the deanery before he became aware of this function: and that the prayers composed for Mrs. Esther Johnson on her death-bed breathe the most intense religious conviction."

After this statement, doubtless the writer of it will be surprised to hear that the person he describes as "an old Scotchwoman" not only "must have known," but did actually know and record the fact of Swift's secret devotions, as revealed by Delany.

"It is told, as if it were to Swift's credit, that the Dean of St. Patrick's performed his family devotions, but with such secrecy that the guests in his own house did not know it."

"Swift was a reverend and pious spirit—for Swift could love and Swift could pray. Through the storms and tempests of his furious mind the stars of religion and love break out in the blue, shining serenely, though hidden by the driving clouds and the maddened hurricane of his life."

Swift's life is a mournful record of dissatisfied ambition and of unfulfilled aims. He was, as it were, urged onwards by his own strong spirit only to be driven backward by relentless destiny, until the wings of his spirit were broken, and he could soar no more. Swift's career at the University of Dublin was neither brilliant nor disgraceful. He did fairly well in his classics, which in those days was the only branch of study really worthy of much attention; but the formal logic of the time was too much for him. He lived soberly and observed the statutes. He was not really remarkable for anything, not even (like our good Goldsmith) for wild and boyish pranks; but he could make a good fire, and this fact was noticed and commented upon by Prof. Baldwyn. I think the weight of evidence as to Swift's college career goes to show that he did not as a student keep his nose continuously to the grindstone; but having the normal measure of youth's exuberance of spirits, he indulged in the ordinary amount of youth's extravagances. An occasional "spree" is, I am certain, not within the mischief meant to be guarded against by the college statutes; and Irishmen, of all others, will not judge Swift harshly because he was not in his rooms precisely at ten o'clock every night. He may have been; but would the fact make us think more highly of him?

For Swift's education Mr. King gives some credit to the famous school at Kilkenny, where it began, but none whatsoever to the University of Dublin, where it was completed. Swift entered Trinity College at the age of fourteen, his education had then, we may infer, little more than begun. In his degree examination, although he did not do brilliantly, he was "well in the running" with his fellow-students. If he did get his degree speciali gratia, that form of degree was at the time a most usual one. But Mr. King does not think kindly of Dublin University. "What is the harmless little joke [of Baldwyn's about the fire] meant to prove?" that, in common with Thackeray, Baldwyn was "wooden-headed." "Only the head of a university," we are told, "could be so wooden-headed."

When Mr. King "does not like Dr. Fell" he has two methods of showing it—namely, by describing him as wooden-headed, or as "an old woman." Accordingly, we are told that "only an old woman could have discovered in Jonathan Swift only an old woman's cleverness." We are furthermore informed, as "a fact that none will question," "that a university course is as little likely to discover or produce a genius as a circus is likely to recognise or produce a Pegasus." A little observation will at once show us that there is no parallel whatsoever between the production of a "Pegasus" and of a genius, because one is impossible, while the other is possible. Here, again, the rule of "the right word in the right place" might have been followed with advantage. We venture to suggest "a Persimmon."

More mournful nonsense has been written about Swift than about any other great writer; and his misfortunes are assigned too much to the machinations of men, and too little to the workings of God. Swift began his life with many good and excellent gifts. A loving mother, to begin with, a good education, more kindness from his relatives than is often to be met with, an early friendship with Temple—one of the most accomplished men of his time; afterwards the esteem and friendship of Addison and of Pope; the love of Stella, whose very name is a lode-star of sweet womanly affection; and, for what it was worth, all the political influence that he desired. One thing alone he lacked, and that was health of mind and body. He could easily have gained anything on earth which his immense genius could command, if only disease had not followed him like a loathed fiend. That was why he was so bitter against many who might justly have claimed his gratitude. Over and over again he was for days together incapacitated from work by that pressure upon the brain, which in the end deprived him of reason. He felt this, and was anxious to acquire some settled income upon which he could live a life of comparative ease.

Mr. King has interlarded his book here and there with maxims of very doubtful value or good taste, as, for example:

"Theology is the sole science women effect [sic], and the less intelligent the woman the more profound invariably is her conversance with this mystery."

The chapter upon the Drapier Letters follows the common view of the motives which actuated Swift when he wrote them, which view is not, I think, fully borne out by facts. Swift is supposed to have attacked Wood's scheme, not because it was economically a dangerous one, but for the sentimental reason that part of the money to be made by it was to flow into the coffers of the wicked Duchess of Kendal. The real facts are, however, that the amount in money to be paid for Wood's halfpence was nearly one-fourth of the entire specie currency in Ireland; and before Swift took up the cause at all, there was a strong feeling in Ireland that the new coinage would be productive of enormous financial difficulties. Such a state of popular feeling absolves Swift from Mr. King's charge of disingenuousness. The subject was very carefully examined by Froude in his English in Ireland.

So much of what one may call "newspaper patriotism" has been imported into this work that it sometimes becomes almost ludicrous; for a certain kind of "tall writing" is quite out of place outside the columns of a provincial newspaper, as, for example:

"Ireland, it is true, always had the advantage in armour of England, poetically:

"Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just."

"But the power which is on the side of the big battalions laughs at this air-woven armour of poetry. Accordingly, the eleven men well-armed would hold down for ever the single man in his shirt, in spite of the armour wherewith the poets—like the rascally tailors in 'The Emperor's New Clothes'—would have equipped him, but for two things: first, the distraction of English quarrels; and, secondly, the distraction of English divisions."

And so on, very much in the style of "And so she went into the garden to cut a cabbage leaf." It may be noticed, in passing, that the poet alluded to in the above—who, by the way, was Shakspeare—never intended to invest an unarmed man with air-woven armour, but simply meant to say that, in a just quarrel, an armed man is thrice armed.

The merits of the book are to be found in the earnestness of the writer, who is full of tender compassion for Swift's sufferings. The faults of style and surprising immaturity of thought are such as time can mend.

I should like to go into the subject more fully if space allowed, for the story of Swift's life holds one spell-bound with wonder and sadness. Condemnation is lost in pity. But although Swift suffered much, and his sufferings at times overshadowed his mind, that mind was naturally cheerful. He was not by any means the morose and gloomy giant of popular fancy, eternally groaning in spirit and flashing out scorn for the human race, with vultures, metaphorically speaking, tearing at his liver. He scorned the human race, but, as Mr. Ashe King justly points out, only in general. In general he spared neither man nor woman, but to individuals he was more than womanly in his tenderness. In 1736, he wrote to George Falkner expressing a desire once more to write a book solely for the purpose of eulogising a dead friend:

"I have often mentioned to you an earnest desire I had, and still have, to record the merit and services of Lord Mayor Humphrey French."

"When I have got sufficient information, although I am oppressed with age and infirmities, I will stir up all the little spirit I can raise and give the public an account of that great patriot."

There are no more tender records of true affection than Swift's Little Letters to Stella—secrets only meant for themselves alone: their child-like babblings, their hidden words, so meaningless to the vulgar, yet so full of meaning. These contain a tragedy, before which all other tragedies are as a child's lightly shed tears. Who can think of them, even for a moment, unmoved?

GEORGE NEWCOMEN.

Poems of John Donne. Edited by E. K. Chambers, with an Introduction by George Saintsbury. (Lawrence & Bullen.)

Two recent volumes of "The Muses' Library" contain a critical and scholarly edition by Mr. Chambers of the complete poems of John Donne, lover and divine. Prof. Saintsbury's zealous introduction may gain converts: there is a danger, also, that it may imperil their faith by requiring of them a too enthusiastic joy. Readers, at least, whose devotion is assured and reasonably grounded, might be better pleased if the tranquil words of Izaak Walton stood in its place. The present generation of readers of poetry is not inclined to undervalue the Elizabethan and Jacobean writers: it makes allowances for their eccentricities, if it does not exalt them into virtues. It would be safer now, than it ever has been since their own period, to place the poems alone before the public. It has enough of the historic sense to see the merits which are there, and to refrain from grumbling because the peculiar excellencies of another age are wanting. The time is past for "versifying" Donne. Eighteenth-century critics were of opinion that he had no more of "numbers" than was contained in a fixed quantity of syllables; others would not allow even so much as that. To suit their taste, his satires were improved by Pope. We should not be inclined to commit them to the Laureate for conversion into nineteenth-century style. We are quite content to read Donne as he is: only, much as we feel the splendid force and freshness of his best things, we feel also the tediousness of the scholastic jargon, the frigid conceits, the rugged, stammering lines, which are never far away. We read, for instance,

"O! my love is slain; I saw him go O'er the white Alps alone"; and pity and terror prevail upon us, till in the next words—

"I saw him, I, Assail'd, fight, taken, stabb'd, bleed, fall, and die"— the rhetorical artifice is fatal to the tragic effect. So it ever is in Donne: he wrote matchless lines, but no perfect poem. It is useless to pretend that he did; any fair criticism should recognise that the bad lines are the rule, the good the exception. Now Prof. Saintsbury, and another of Donne's eulogists, Prof. Edward Dowden, writing doubtless with the best intentions, produce a false impression. They quote, one after another, the magnificent romantic lines:

"Her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought
That one might almost say her body thought."

"A bracelet of bright hair about the bone."

"I wonder, by my troth, what thou and I Did till we loved?"

"No spring nor summer beauty hath such grace
As I have seen in one autumnal face."

And I quote them too, for the temptation is irresistible. But if one is grateful to Prof. Dowden or Prof. Saintsbury for the mosaic of precious fragments which he has put together out of Donne, and is encouraged to go to Donne himself and cut larger blocks from the quarry, disappointment is inevitable. These gentlemen have not told us that they have picked out all the best pieces; but the fact is that little of the same quality remains, and that we have to climb over, or walk round, or pick to pieces, mighty heaps of rubbish before we find new treasures. In pure poetry no section is so rich as the first, the "Songs and Sonnets." The "Elegies," after all their astonishing changes of mood, close with the most audacious, the most frankly pagan love-poem in the English language. The "Divine Poems," which follow at once in singular contrast to the twentieth Elegy, belong to Donne's later years; for the religious mood did not co-exist or alternate in him with the licentious, as it did in the pagan prelates of the Italian Renaissance. Donne's life as a Churchman was no less sincere and thoroughgoing than his life as a pleasure-seeker had been. Through both periods runs that morbid preoccupation with the ghastly imagery of death, which shows itself most distinctly in the two poems "The Funeral" and "The Relic," while it appears again in his curious fancy for sitting for his portrait in a shroud. The irregularities of Donne's verse have been exaggerated, especially by the afore-said eighteenth-century critics. That age was very intolerant of elision, as Donne's descendant Cowper used to complain to his correspondents when he was translating Homer and saturating himself with Milton's blank verse, to the disgust of some of the friends to whom he first submitted his version for criticism. The fault in Donne does not lie so much in the superfluity or deficiency of syllables, as in the careless habit of accentuating trivial words and passing lightly over those on which stress should be laid. Donne had a wonderful talent for impressive openings, going straight to the point with no waste of words. The first line of all is a singularly unfortunate introduction to his works; but in the second poem, "The Good-morrow," and in almost every one of the succeeding lyrics, best of all, perhaps, in "The Expiration,"

"So, so, break off this last lamenting kiss," the attention is arrested by the opening words, though it may wander before the stanzas reach their close.

Mr. Chambers has added, in this edition, eleven poems, previously uncollected, attributed on grounds of varying cogency to Donne. One of these, "The Constant Lover," is a charming piece; but so smooth in execution and so conventional in thought that I should doubt the attribution, were it not for the opening line—

"I know as well as you she is not fair"—which has Donne's fine impatience and rapidity of movement.

A number of spurious poems are rejected; others are placed in an appendix as doubtful. The reasons for all these changes are plainly and sensibly stated in the notes; and the collation of MSS. and editions for the establishment of the text has been carried out with all the patience and accuracy which are demanded in a critical edition of an unjustly neglected writer.

CAMPBELL DODGSON.

"A HISTORY OF AURICULAR CONFESSION AND INDULGENCES IN THE LATIN CHURCH."

By Henry Charles Lea. Vol. II., Confession and Absolution. (Sonnenschein.)

In this second volume Dr. Lea continues his historical survey of the doctrine and practice of Confession and Absolution in the Latin Church. As he comes nearer to modern times, and the ideas and the language in which they are expressed grow more similar to those of to-day, we have far fewer mistakes than appeared in the early part of the former volume. Dr. Lea manifestly strives to attain an almost scientific impartiality, even when such impartiality lands him in well-nigh negative results. In dealing with the Penitentials he remarks, and truly, how beneficial their influence was:

"Crude and unsatisfactory as were the Penitentials in many things, taken as a whole their influence cannot but have been salutary. They inculcated on the still barbarous populations lessons of charity and loving-kindness, of forgiveness of injuries, and of helpfulness to the poor and the stranger, as part of the discipline whereby the sinner could redeem his sins. Besides this, the very vagueness of the boundary between secular and spiritual matters enabled them to instil ideas of order and decency and cleanliness and hygiene among the rude inhabitants of central and northern Europe" (p. 106, and cf. p. 412).

All who have studied the history of the early Middle Ages will, I think, assent to the truth of this; and so also of the following on the Schoolmen, though perhaps with some slight reserve:

"They promoted ethical development, and accustomed thinking men to apply more delicate tests to conduct, even though, at the same time, they furnished dialectics by which the inconvenient rigor of Christ's teachings could be reconciled with the necessities of human nature. The close examination made by the Schoolmen of the ethical value of actions has borne fruit in establishing principles and habits of thought which are the common heritage of the race to-day" (p. 413).

Dr. Lea marks well the great change which took place when public penance and the penitentials and public reconciliation gradually gave way to private confession, penance, and absolution. The power of the keys, which up to that time had been mainly exercised by the bishop, passed into the hands of the priest and confessor; and this, again, was enhanced when confession from voluntary became obligatory, by the decree of the Lateran Council in 1216, at least once a year. The strictness of the seal of confession, which necessarily followed on its universal obligation, equally of necessity broke down the rigour of the older punitive and public penances, and favoured laxity; because the enforcement of open and severe penance would have disclosed the nature of the sins confessed. It was the necessity of avoiding this scandal which chiefly opened the door by which laxity was introduced. It was thus the interest both of penitent and confessor alike to avoid scandal, and to keep intact the seal of the confessional.

It is also well shown how the burden put upon the ordinary priest by this universal obligatory confession was more than he could bear. Its requirements were more than he could possibly fulfil: it demanded a delicacy of discrimination, a power of insight, an experience and learning to which he could make no pretence. He had thus to lean on authority, without the means of judging which of contending authorities might be right; and this forced him to accept and act on any authority that was probably right. We have detailed to us historically the successive waves of laxity and rigour which have passed over the Church, the conservatives ever seeking to uphold the more rigorous course. The rule, which was at first to uphold only the safest course in morals, drops to the safer course, then to any safe course; then, in consulting authorities as to what is safe, we should follow only the more probable, this declines to the probable, at last even the less probable may be chosen without sin: anything, almost, is better than to let the penitent depart without absolution. As a whole, the history is one of the triumph of laxity. The temporary victories of the rigorists have been fruitless victories. The triumphs of the Jansenists, in spite of their irrefragable logic, urged by literary genius and force of character, with all the weight of conservatism on their side, were but short-lived, and were more apparent than real. The Jesuits, although they were expelled and their Order suppressed, have won the day. The system of Liguori, which is now prevalent, is only a modified probabilism. Dr. Lea points out constantly how unscrupulous Liguori is in his citations, and how reckless in his historical assertions, and also how intense is the dislike of the Jansenists and Gallicans by the reigning school of the present day. He has not the least exaggerated matters in this respect: they are represented as the most dangerous of heretics, and are branded at times as atheists. As is here stated (p. 350), when the Church in France was reconstituted by Napoleon in the Concordat the last barrier to the encroachments of Rome was broken down. To the Papal mind Gallicanism, Jansenism, and rigorism were connected as the embodiment of the forces inimical to the Holy See (p. 350).

We mentioned that Dr. Lea's conclusions are mainly negative. "The scheme of interposing the priest between man and his Creator is not an ethical success" (p. 411); and again, after sketching as "an enticing day-dream" a picture of what confession was intended to be, he adds: "Whatever benefits accrued from the enforcement of confession as a stated duty were fully neutralised by its attendant evils" (p. 415). The laxity of the current manuals of the Roman Church is not at all exaggerated in these pages. It is a fact that in many districts the morality of the people is higher in certain directions than that laid down in these manuals. But when, with an adverse bias to the use of confession, Dr. Lea attempts by means of criminal statistics a hasty comparison of different forms of Christianity and even of Mohammedanism, the outcome is that:

"In fact, religion has much less influence on morals—at least on that portion of morals which falls under the jurisdiction of the police—than we are in the habit of believing, and our confidence in the ethical benefits derived from Christian teaching is unfortunately not justified by facts" (p. 431).

We believe that all comparisons made from such statistics are illusory. A greater amount of crime detected and punished may be a proof simply of a higher standard of public opinion, while the prevalence of certain forms of outward crime may be symptomatic of a less amount of hidden vice.

The present work is still incomplete, but there is an excellent index to these two volumes. We look forward with eagerness for the volume or volumes on Indulgences. The present instalments will not satisfy partisans on either side, nor will they satisfy the exact scholar; and some may think that it was hardly worth while to undertake such great labour for so negative a result. Yet all must acknowledge the patience and industry of the author, and the great usefulness of the materials which he has collected and arranged—the value of these to the historian is not at all affected by the conclusions arrived at.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

A GERMAN EDITION OF THE "UTOPIA."

"LATEINISCHE LITTERATURDENKMÄLER DES XV. UND XVI. JAHRHUNDERTS." No. 11: Thomas More's "Utopia." Herausgegeben von V. Michels u. Th. Ziegler. (Berlin: Weidmanns.)

THIS new edition of the Utopia is one of a collection of reprints of the important Latin compositions of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The series is edited by Prof. Hermann, with the assistance of a great number of continental scholars, among whom may be mentioned the names of Geiger, Hartfelder, Knod, Neff, and de Nolhac; and its appearance is an indication of the increased interest now felt in the literature of the Renaissance and Reformation, and in the claims of this literature to be more carefully edited, or, indeed, to be edited at all. Many of the works republished are the commonplaces of literary history; though few, except the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum, have received any critical handling before. But the majority of them, the interest of which is more special, are only accessible in early editions or unscholarly reprints; and the gratitude of students is due to the editors who are combining to produce cheap and careful reprints of Wimpheling, Eobanus Hessus, Crocus, and other less known, though not less interesting, humanists.

This issue of the Utopia, which is the work of Profs. Michels and Ziegler, is unfortunate in having to challenge competition, especially in England, with the fine edition lately published by Mr. Lupton. It is based on the editio princeps, Th. Martin, Louvain (1516); and that text, in which there were many errors, is corrected by the Froben issue of March 1518, which was probably revised by More himself. The text, therefore, varies from that of Mr. Lupton's, who chose the Froben issue for his basis.

The Introduction, of which there are 70 pages, contains a very suggestive essay on the subject-matter of the Utopia by Prof. Ziegler. For the rest of the work Prof. Michels is responsible. It includes a short Life of More, an account of early editions, a few notes, and the critical apparatus of the text. The Life is written with a careful examination of English authorities; but the critical part of the Introduction has not been executed with the accuracy which is essential to reprints, and on which their value almost entirely depends—a fault which is uncommon in German work. The collation of Gourmont's edition of 1517, which Prof. Michels was unable to examine in person, is full of errors; and so also is the printed title-page of Robynson's 1551 translation. In the list of editions the Junta issue (Venice, 1519) is omitted, and the second Basle edition of November, 1518, is only mentioned as uncertain, though several copies are known to exist—another indication of the need for some sort of universal bibliography of rarer books, such as is being prepared in Belgium. Also, an edition of Burnet's translation in 1682 is mentioned, two years earlier than the edition which is universally accepted in England as the first.

But if Prof. Michels has failed of accuracy, he has failed in a big endeavour. He has brought together in his Introduction a great mass of detailed information, comprising selections from letters illustrating the early publication of the Utopia, a very elaborate comparison of the various editions and their contents, and accounts of the translations. His researches on this last point bring out the curious fact that the book was translated into German, Italian, and French, before it appeared in its native English.

We may deplore, however, that the marginal notes of the early editions, instead of being placed by the side of the text, are embedded in an inextricable hotch-potch of various readings at the beginning. And in an edition intended for students it is a pity to find the notes massed together, rather than printed at the foot of the passages they are designed to illustrate.

NEW NOVELS.

The Harding Scandal. By Frank Barrett. In 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

Ruth Farmer. By Agnes Marchbank. (Jarrold.)

The Statement of Stella Maberly. Written by Herself. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Oracle of Baal. By J. Provand Webster. (Hutchinson.)

A Question of Degree. By Caroline Fothergill. (A. & C. Black.)

Rachel Langton. By Sarah Tytler. (Ward & Downey.)

Joan and Mrs. Carr. By "Rita." (White.)

As the Shadow of a Great Rock. By Maria English. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Kathleen O'Leovan. By Maurice Grindon. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

MR. FRANK BARRETT is not his own equal in The Harding Scandal. Whether the fault be in us or not we cannot say, but it strikes us as being poorly conceived and cheaply constructed. Certainly there is little of the spirit and go which generally characterise the author's novels. Lady Harding is compromised by an old card-player, who is seen by the husband in his wife's room. A long period of wretchedness and misery ensues for the husband, who suspects his best friend, and leaves his home to become a wanderer on the face of the earth. Ultimately he is discovered on the Riviera, where the man who has caused his wife to be distrusted, and given rise to the Harding scandal, confesses to him that his wife is true, and always has been. The secret of their relations is that he had once stood in loco parentis to her during their early days together at the Antipodes. The husband is so enraged that he pushes the villain over a bridge in the Corniche Road, exclaiming, "Pray to heaven to forgive you for robbing me of wife and child and friend, of honour and name, and all hope of salvation." Exit villain! and shortly afterwards Harding himself, whose life is worn out by grief and illness. He dies, with his wife by his side and the friend whom he had unjustly accused. There is some power revealed in the closing scenes.

The sorrows of a wife who is totally misunderstood by her husband form the basis of Ruth Farmer. Roy Paterson is a Scotsman on the shore of the Gareloch, rich but selfish, and his wife is apparently light and frivolous in character. This carelessness of conduct and demeanour, however, only hides a deeper nature. She leaves her home under circumstances which point to death by drowning in the waters of the Gareloch, and her husband is just going to marry again when he becomes at one and the same time disenchanted with his proposed bride and convinced of the fact that his wife is living. The wife has gone through severe trials, losing for a time her baby boy, who is the apple of her eye, and being dragged down to the depths of poverty. By-and-by things are put right, husband and wife come together again, both refined in spirit by the chastening they have gone through. Several of the minor characters are creditably drawn, and the volume is fairly well written.

When a publisher goes the length of writing a Preliminary Note to one of his publications—and that merely a work of the imagination—the expectation mounts very high indeed. After carefully reading The Statement of Stella Maberley, we think it would have been better for Mr. Fisher Unwin to let it stand alone. His anticipation that the narrative will “excite interest and sympathy,” and his further remark that he considers it “strange and striking,” rather handicap the critic. However, we only found the story to be one of those psychological studies so much in vogue just now, built up on somewhat weird and fantastic ideas and convictions which haunted the heroine. We are getting somewhat tired of novels beginning “I, So and So, being of sound mind” (though the reader would not think it), or words to that effect. Stella Maberley was a very uncomfortable sort of young woman, who had very uncomfortable experiences, and was the cause of similar experiences in others. We shall not reveal the details of her history, but perhaps the best part of the sketch is that devoted to the changes which come over her and her girl friend, Evelyn. Occasionally we alight upon a striking passage; but, taken as a whole, we do not care for the book. It is better, perhaps, than some of its kind, but certainly not so good as others we could mention.

Mr. J. Provand Webster is yet another follower in the footsteps of Mr. Rider Haggard. Were it not that we have become quite accustomed to these stories of adventure among unheard-of peoples, and were it not that we have already waded up to the knees in gore (metaphorically speaking) at least a score of times, we should probably have found The Oracle of Baal more moving and blood-curdling than we do. There is a wicked queen who enthralled a white man, there is a cave filled with skeletons, there is a wonderful battle of the phantoms, a strange journeying through “a silken way” and over fire hills; and lastly there is the overthrow of Baal and the destruction of the African city of Wayangora. Those who like excitement will find it in abundance here. One of the travellers has an adventure with an animal that nearly embedded its claws in his heart, which makes Victor Hugo’s description of the fight with the octopus seem tame by comparison. The narrator of these records exclaims, “Oh, if I could only have been permitted to return to Scotland with a sackful of the city’s records!” &c. But we are very glad he wasn’t. He has got together, as it is, a pretty gruesome list of adventures; and Scotsmen—though proverbially long-suffering—will no doubt be content to be spared the rest.

Very clever and epigrammatic is A Question of Degree; indeed, we feel sometimes that Miss Fothergill is working uncommonly hard to keep up the strain. But for sheer native ability and literary skill her book is certainly the best on our list. All the characters are drawn with unmistakable power and insight, and each maintains his or her distinct individuality to the close. There may be said to be two heroines and two principal male characters; but the best couple, perhaps, are Theodora Markenfield and Oliver Woodford. We can see that these two are destined for each other, though Woodford wisely allows the wayward but brilliant Theodora to pick up wisdom by experience on her way to the final goal. Some of the smart things said are bitter as well as smart.

“We are all fools more or less, and the greatest are those who think they are not.” “Discipline based on principle is always a failure, because there is no heart in it.” “My worst feelings always inspire my best actions.” “I should never think of posing as innocent in days when innocence is considered a greater crime than sin.” “I know nothing more wearisome in conversation than incessant streams of sense.”

If this volume had been an autobiography, we should have said that it was written by some one who had just missed life’s greatest boon—whatever that might be—and that she had become permanently unhappy in consequence.

Miss Tytler’s Rachel Langton is a high-toned and deeply interesting story, albeit not sensational. The heroine is a woman of strong principle, whose quixotic actions one cannot but admire. Her face was set against many of the usages and shams of society; and as is frequently the case with fine spirits of this type, she erred on the side of a severe judgment of the world. For example, her attitude towards the stage was a very hostile one, especially as offering a career for women. She thought the theatrical life endangered a woman’s delicacy, modesty, and Christian integrity. Yet she came to see in the young actress Essex Etheredge one of the noblest models for her sex, and gladly welcomed her marriage with her son. On other questions also she showed a commendable openness to conviction. The son is a fine spirited fellow, who as a landlord dared to run counter to the ideas and prejudices of his class. The description of Sophy Green, the advanced woman, is a piece of genuine comedy. This story may be read with advantage for its intrinsic interest and also for its elevating sympathies.

Mrs. Carr, the central figure of Rita’s new novel, is one of those women with a past who are so much in evidence just now in literature and on the stage. She had a dark passage in her early life as a handsome young Irishwoman, which is kept concealed from everybody; and in order to drown her recollections she leads a feverish existence in Society. Presently Joan, a beautiful young Irish girl, comes to live with her, and the nobility of her character makes a deep impression on the apparently frivolous woman. The burden of the story is rather sad, but there is occasionally a gleam of humour, as when the author describes the proceedings of an advanced women’s club. After twenty years a brilliant actor turns up, who proves to be the man who had wronged Mrs. Carr in the past. Startling revelations follow closely upon each other’s heels, and Joan is thunderstruck to discover that the woman whom she has long pitied is really her own mother. There are other characters in the story who are well and sharply drawn, including Captain Talbot, who wins the love of Joan, and the esthetic but wealthy idiot Sir Anthony Morpeth-Yeo, who vainly tries to capture the affections of Mrs. Carr. This sketch of nineteenth century life is very bright and spirited.

Current fiction undoubtedly wants purifying, but whether that end can be successfully accomplished by running to the opposite extreme of goody-goodness is problematical. The hero in As the Shadow of a Great Rock talks for all the world like a Sunday-school teacher, and religiously improves every occasion that comes to his hand. Now Sunday-school teachers are to some extent the salt of the earth, and have done noble work; but people do not turn to a novel with the object of finding Scripture quotations obtruded upon almost every page. But, having said so much, we may admit that James Forrester, in the present story, was a very good and brave fellow, who took far more of the sins of his scape-grace brother upon his own shoulders than he ought to have done. After a long period of wandering, it is satisfactory to find this prodigal brother returning to his uncle’s house a wiser and a better man. Miss English’s sentiments are unexceptionable, but there are too many of them.

A dainty little volume is Kathleen O’Leovan, which its author describes as “a fantasy.” It is charmingly produced, inside and out, and the autolithographs by Mr. Fullwood add to its value. Mr. Grindon writes tenderly and sympathetically of the life-story of the loving young heroine Kathleen, “saint and prophetess of Ireland.” With regard to her alleged literary remains, while the ideas do not strike us as being profoundly new, they are frequently put in a very suggestive form. Her reflections on Irish affairs and prospects in particular are worthy of attention.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

TWO VOLUMES OF VERSE.

Christopher Marlowe, and Belphegor. By James Dryden Hosken. (Henry.) These are two short poems—the first a tragedy in three acts, the second a “harlequinade in doggerel.”

as the author calls it—by the author of "Phaon and Sappho" and "Nimrod." They are of much slighter texture than his earlier work, and hardly, in any strict sense of the term, comparable to it. But there is no doubt in our mind that "Christopher Marlowe" is very much better than "Belphegor." There is a tender and graceful pathos about several of the short scenes in which love and early death strive for the triumph over Marlowe's soul (e.g., pp. 44, 45):

"Marlowe: What can we do
More fitting this fair season of our hopes
Than to unlock the door of happy thoughts
With old-time songs well suited to our state?
The day is falling, and this time was made
To touch our souls with beauty and content,
And give us glimpses of our better selves—
Still regions, holy quiet, and that charm
Within whose circle elemental thought Takes wings, and doth enlarge the narrowing view
Of this dim world of days, and falling breath,
And perishable bloom, and falling seas,
And all this wondrous frame, this realm of time
We people for a moment.

Esther. Still discourse,
And I will lie and listen, till I hear
The very beating of the heart of God."

This is, we think, the best passage in the book, but there are others nearly as fine. This kind of work Mr. Hoaken can do, and do well. But "Belphegor" required other gifts, which are not those of Mr. Hoaken. Belphegor is sent by Lucifer from the abode of the lost to take on him man's estate on earth, and marry a wife, and so, in due course, be able to report, in hell, the real facts of married life on earth, of which the "sad husbands" relate such grievous tales when they come among the dead. It is an ingenious, even a brilliant, idea for a satirical extravaganza. Byron would have worked it out admirably. But Mr. Hoaken breaks it off, fantastically, in the middle, with a ridiculous scene in which Belphegor, like Faustus, insults the Pope, and there is an end? The whole object of his embassy remains untouched. Nor is the versification quite worthy of Mr. Hoaken. Even in an extravaganza, "sympathy" and "antipathy" (p. 114) cannot be held to be rhymes, nor "advance" and "excellence" (p. 130), nor "talk" and "stock" (p. 135), nor "propose" and "clothes" (p. 84). There is vigour about the poem; but it is without form or finish, and more odd than witty.

Divers Ditties. By Alex. McMillan. (Contable.) Ditties that tripped lightly under the punkah five-and-twenty years ago move leaden-footed now. They lived in bygone associations, and display but faded charms. Time has dulled the humours of "Anundorum Boreeah," the "Stunt," the "Wohobby Horse," and the "Wallah of 1869." And yet that Wallah cried:

"Go cultivate the Grub Street Muse, Go preach on forty pounds a year;
Go sweep a crossing, cobble shoes,
But don't, my brethren, don't come here."

In "The Road to Pepityapore," which, by the way, has been set to music, Mr. McMillan gives us another nut-brown maid—in India maids are married young:

"Her speech was a patois, mine learnt out of books,
So we talked less by words than the language of looks,
And it took us an hour, ay, and more," &c., &c.

We wonder, not at the hour, but whether broken harmonies of feeling were meant to be caught up in the broken harmony of sound. Some of the Adaptations run freely enough.

"The Widow of Grass" has humour, and "Alun Aheer" has a ring of its own:

"As to which is loved best let the Thakur reply, Whom your law and the Bunneah has bled till he's dry;
Ask the multitude weary to death of the rule
That cleanses and counts them and sends them to school;
Ask the trader taxed bare of the gains of a year,
If Sirkar is more gentle than Alun Aheer."

Some of Mr. McMillan's ditties will be liked on their own account, some "for auld lang syne"; whether they were worth reprinting he is the best judge.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will publish next week Climbs in the New Zealand Alps, by Mr. Edward A. Fitzgerald, giving an account of his ascent of five peaks hitherto unscaled, and his discovery of a long-sought-for pass across the ranges. There will also be appendices on the geology, glacier-action, botany, and zoology of the region, contributed by Prof. Bonney, Sir W. Martin Conway, and Mr. C. L. Barrow. The volume will contain over sixty illustrations, reproduced from pictures specially drawn by Mr. Joseph Pennell, Mr. A. G. Willink, and Mr. A. D. McCormick, partly from photographs taken by the author. An édition de luxe on Japanese paper will be further illustrated with a portrait of the author, after Sir E. Burne Jones.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN are about to publish, under the title Stories of Naples and the Camorra, a volume by the late Charles Grant, dealing with various phases of life among Neapolitans, principally of the lower classes, and throwing much light upon the working of the most notorious of Italian secret societies. Mr. Grant, who died a few years ago, lived for many years in Naples, and succeeded in gaining the confidence of the common people around him to an unusual degree. Some of the results of his observation are embodied in these stories; only one of which, the shortest, appeared during his lifetime, in the Cornhill Magazine. The book will contain a brief memoir of the author, in which the origin of the stories is explained, by a personal friend who knew him well.

MESSRS. T. & T. CLARK, of Edinburgh, will shortly publish, as a new volume in their "International Critical Commentary," a Commentary on the Synopses of the Four Gospels, by two Oxford scholars—Prof. Sanday, of Christ Church, and the Rev. Willoughby C. Allen, chaplain-fellow of Exeter.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRUBNER & Co. will publish next week, in a limited edition, a book on the Deer Forests of Scotland, by Mr. Augustus Grimbly, dealing with the history, area, and shooting accommodation of every important forest in Scotland.

MR. JOHN MACQUEEN will publish on June 30 The Wild Life of Scotland, by the Rev. J. H. Crawford, with numerous illustrations by Mr. John Williamson.

A REVISED edition of Ros Rosarum by E. V. B. is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will contain many new contributions, besides verses by Lord Tennyson, Earl Lytton, John Addington Symonds, and Mr. Hamilton Aidé, which have not been published elsewhere. The book is being printed at the Chiswick Press, and will be freely illustrated by the author.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & Co. announce for publication next week: The History of Economics, by Mr. H. Dunning MacLeod, the appearance of which has been delayed by the illness of the author; and The Man on the March, being reminiscences of sport in England and the colonies, by Mr. Martin Cobbett, who writes under the pseudonym of "Mr. Sporting Notions."

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will publish immediately a volume of stories by Marie Correlli, entitled Cameos, with a title-page and frontispiece designed by Mr. G. H. Edwards.

MR. A. E. W. MASON, author of "The Courtship of Maurice Buckler," has undertaken to write a novel, which, after first appearing as a serial, will be published in book form by Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co. in the autumn of 1897.

THE annual general meeting of the Royal Statistical Society will be held on Tuesday next, at 5 p.m., at 9, Adelphi-terrace, Strand.

THE annual general meeting of the Jewish Historical Society of England will be held in the rooms of the Maccoabaeans, St. James's Hall, on Sunday next, at 8 p.m., for accepting the report and electing officers for the ensuing year. A paper will be also read by the Rev. S. Singer, on "Early Translations of the Jewish Prayer Book in England."

THE eighth summer assembly of the National Home-Reading Union will be held this year at Ohester, from June 27 to July 6, under the presidency of the Duke of Westminster. The Bishop of Peterborough has consented to deliver the inaugural lecture on Monday, June 29, his subject being "The Moral Aspect of History." Two special courses of lectures will be given—on the geology of the district, by Mr. J. E. Marr; and on the botany of the district, by Mr. G. F. Scott Elliot; while Mr. W. H. St. John Hope will give a lecture on "Medieval Monastic Arrangements, with special reference to Ohester." There will also be excursions to Hawarden Castle, Valle Crucis Abbey, and Llangollen.

It is proposed to establish a memorial of the late Mrs. Rundle Charles, author of Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family, by endowing a bed (to be called by her name) in the North London Hospital for Consumption, near which she lived and in which she took a great interest. Subscriptions may be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. Basil Woodd Smith, Branch-hill-lodge, Hampstead.

ON Thursday next Messrs. Sotheby will sell two libraries—(1) that of Mr. Robert Smith, of Brentham Park, Stirling, which consists mainly of standard modern books, some of them extra-illustrated, and a few rarities in Scottish literature; and (2) that of the late Thomas E. Amyot, which includes a second folio of Shakspeare. On the following day they will sell a really remarkable collection of bindings, the property of Sir Thomas Dick Lauder. Here are to be found books from the libraries of popes and cardinals, emperors and kings; examples in the Grolier, Maioli, Clovis Eve, and Le Gascon styles; embroidered and silver repoussé work; and what is believed to be a unique specimen of Padeloup's binding for Louis XV.

PROF. J. TAFT HATFIELD, of the Northwestern University of Chicago, has just issued a reprint of his monograph entitled "John Wesley's Translations of German Hymns." The author gives a critical survey of the great Methodist's versions of German hymns, which are the more remarkable because, besides being highly poetical, they are not disfigured by any gross blunders, although, as Prof. Hatfield remarks, "German studies hardly existed at the time."

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

IT has been decided that the Savoy shall henceforth appear monthly, instead of quarterly, each number containing about 100 pages of letterpress and from seven to ten full-page illustrations. This will permit the issue of a novel, by Mr. George Moore, in serial form. Among the contents of the July number will be: a short story by Mr. Hubert Crackanthorpe, entitled "Anthony Garstin's Courtship"; a prose-poem by Mr. Stéphane Mallarmé, translated; an essay by Mr. Edward Carpenter, on "The Simplification of Life"; a translation from the Portuguese, by Mr. Edgar Prestage; poems by W. B. Yeats, Ernest Dowson, Aubrey Beardsley, and Arthur Symonds; and the first part of an elaborate article, by Mr. Yeats, in three parts, on Blake's illustrations to Dante, accompanied by the reproduction of eight unpublished drawings by Blake, from the Linnell collection, and of two of the little-known Dante engravings by Blake. There will also be a lithograph, by Mr. Charles H. Shannon, entitled "The Stone Bath"; and a caricature of Arthur Roberts, by Mr. Max Beerbohm.

The July number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review will contain articles on "The Earliest Relations between Russia and China," by Mr. E. H. Parker; "India and Africa," by Capt. F. Younghusband; "Tribal Law in the Punjab," by Mr. H. Baden Powell; "Tinnevely, before and after the British Conquest," by Mr. J. B. Pennington; and a quarterly report on Semitic studies, by Prof. Montet, of Geneva.

In the July number of Blackwood's Magazine will appear an article on "The Imperial Indian Service Troops," written by one who is on the spot and competent to inform readers at home.

THE Windsor Magazine for July will contain the first chapters of a new serial by Mr. Coulson Kernahan, entitled "Captain Shannon"; and also ten short stories by well-known authors.

THE forthcoming number of the Reliquary and Illustrated Archaeologist will contain "Some Forms of Greek Idolatry, II. Hermai and Zoana," by Mr. F. G. Hill; "Old Stone Crosses of Somersetshire," II., by Mr. Alexander Gordon; "Churchyard Games in Wales—Cookfighting," by Mr. Elias Owen; "Cornish Bench Ends," by Mr. Arthur G. Langdon; and notes on French Dolmens, by Mr. Robert Burnard.

WE understand that a series of Burmese sketches, by a new writer who calls himself Lewis Torre, will shortly appear in the English Illustrated Magazine and Sketch.

A SPECIAL feature will appear in the July part of Little Folks, which forms the commencement of the new volume. There will be sixteen pages reproduced in colour in addition to the usual coloured frontispiece. The following new stories will be commenced in this part: "The Tale of a Tambour," by D. H. Parry, and "The Surprising Adventures of Tuppy and Tue," by Maggie Browne.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE Rev. C. H. Middleton-Wake, of Christ's—author of a well-known work on the etchings of Rembrandt—has been appointed Sanders reader in bibliography at Cambridge for the coming year, in succession to Sir E. Maunde Thompson.

NEXT week, at Oxford, it will be proposed to confer the honorary degree of M.A. upon Col. Jervoise, bursar of Kettle; and also upon Mr. Richard Sims, formerly senior assistant in the MS. Department of the British Museum, who is a native of Oxford, and has resided in the city since his retirement from the Museum.

CERTAIN members of the Old and New Testament Revision Companies (including representatives of deceased members) have offered to each of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge a sum of nearly £1800, for the purpose of establishing a fund in aid of the preparation and publication of books on subjects connected with Biblical criticism, which are not likely to be remunerative. At Cambridge, it is proposed that the income shall be administered by the managers of the Hort Memorial Fund, which is already devoted to this object. At Oxford, a scheme for the administration and management of the new fund will be brought forward for consideration next term.

IN Convocation at Oxford next Tuesday, a decree will be proposed, authorising the curators of the Bodleian Library to exchange certain fragments of Egyptian papyri with the trustees of the British Museum. These fragments are not donations: they are nearly worthless to the Bodleian, but would be of use to the Museum to join to its own corresponding fragments.

THE delegates of the common university fund at Oxford have reappointed Mr. H. J. Mackinder to be reader in geography for a further period of five years. Under a new arrangement, the Royal Geographical Society no longer contributes to the emoluments of this readership.

ON the occasion of the Kelvin jubilee, the University of Glasgow conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon the following: Prof. Cleveland Abbe, of Columbian University, Washington; Prof. C. Christiansen, of Copenhagen; Prof. Per Theodor Cleve, of Upsala; General Ferrero; Prof. Isidor Frohlich, of Budapest; Prof. Lippmann, of Paris; Prof. Liversidge, of Sydney; Prof. Eleuthère Mascart, of the Collège de France; Prof. Henri Moissan, of Paris; Prof. Simon Newcomb, of Johns Hopkins; Prof. Nicholas Omor, of Moscow; Prof. Emile Picard, of Paris; Prof. George Quincke, of Heidelberg; and Prof. Woldemar Voigt, of Göttingen.

THE following is the text of the congratulatory letter to Lord Kelvin, written on behalf of the University of Cambridge by the Public Orator, Dr. Sandys, and presented by Sir G. G. Stokes, Dr. Forsyth, and Prof. J. J. Thomson, who were appointed to represent Cambridge at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Lord Kelvin's appointment as professor of natural philosophy in the University of Glasgow:

"Dum tot tantaeque Universitates praecceptorum tam illustri annos quinquaginta Professoris in munere feliciter exactos certatim gratulantur, Universitati nostrae imprimis consentaneum est ob rem tam laetam tamque honorificam suum gaudium confiteri, suam superbiam testificari. Etenim nostra inter nemora (iuvat recordari) quinquagesimo primo abhinc anno studiorum mathematicorum e certamine primo lauream prope primam reportasti, studiorum eorumdem in certamine altero victor renuntiasti. Nostris umbraculis egressus, et alios ex aliis honores serie perpetua propter insignia merita adeptus, physicorum praecertim studiorum provinciam et inventis tuis et exemplo tuo praecclare illustrasti. Tu trans maria magna navigantibus securitatem novam dedisti, septentrionum regionem accuratius indicasti, vada periculosos etiam in ipso transcurso metiri docuisti; tu oceani denique Atlantici litus utrumque vinculo novo coniunxisti. Haec et alia inventa egregia dum contemplamur, non sine superbia recordamur plusquam quinquaginta per annos ipsum inventorem etiam nostra cum Universitate vinculo artissimo fuisse coniunctum. Alumno igitur nostro insigni, non modo annos quinquaginta Professoris in munere prospere peractos, sed etiam vitae annum septuagesimum primum feliciter expletum libenter gratulati, etiam in posterum plurimos per annos omnia fausta ex animo exoptamus. Vale."

MR. ALFRED CARDEW DIXON, of Trinity, has been approved for the degree of Doctor in Science at Cambridge.

MR. L. J. PICTON, of Marton, has been appointed to the biological scholarship in the marine laboratory at Naples, which is endowed out of the common university fund at Oxford.

THE late Mr. W. E. Yates, of Leeds, has bequeathed £10,000 to Mansfield College, Oxford, to endow a professorship in theology, to be called by his own name; and also £1000 to the Yorkshire College, Leeds.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

"THOUGH THE WORLD BLAME THEE."

THOUGH the world blame thee, thou art not to blame;
Though the world praise thee, hearken not at all.

In thine own heart is the reward or shame,
In thine own heart the victory or the fall.

What others think of thee stay not to ask—
Rather than please the many, serve the few;
Knowing that life's most glorious regal task
Is never quite too hard for thee to do.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

IN the Boletín of the Real Academia de la Historia for May, E. Ballesteros determines the site of the Jewish cemetery at Avila. Padre Fita, in an admirably reasoned paper, clears up some doubtful points in Visigothic epigraphy, and fixes the chronology: these inscriptions show also the extent of relic worship in the seventh century. But the most important article is the correspondence of Francisco de Rojas, printed by Rodriguez Villa. On April 30, 1604, King Ferdinand wrote to his ambassador at Rome:

"With regard to the said dispensation of England, as we have already written to you, it is of no such great matter to press it on or to defer it, because the truth is that the marriage between the Prince of Wales, don Carlos (whom God have) and the Princess of Wales our daughter was not confirmed by carnal copulation, but she remained as when she was born, and for this a small dispensation suffices, and there would be no need to ask for one unless for obedience to the Church, but the King of England on account that in future there should be no doubt either in case the said marriage were consummated or were not, demands that the dispensation say that it was consummated, although the truth is to the contrary; and because the dispensation should be above suspicion, and that what the King of England demands should be fulfilled, it will be better not to say that it were consummated or not consummated, but that even if it should have been consummated a dispensation is given for this other marriage; and what was said in the brief which you sent dispenses for this second marriage, even though it were consummated by carnal copulation, is not necessary; because nothing else passed except taking hands, and the Prince though he was not of ripe age, they were not united; but to take away all doubt as to what might be said in the future, it is not undecidable to put it there, and because there should be no mistake, we send you from here the minute of how the said brief should come, and take steps to send it to us according to the adjoined minute."

It will be observed that this was written five years before the marriage of Henry VIII. and Catherine, on June 7, 1509. Ferdinand had doubtless received the assurance of the non-consummation of the marriage from Catherine herself. The doubt seems to have existed only in the mind of Henry VII., or it may have been only a legal precaution on his part.

THE SOURCE OF CHAUCER'S "PERSON'S TALE."

Oxford.

The points of likeness between the first folios of MS. Bodley 90 and the corresponding part of Chaucer's Person's Tale are more numerous than I was able to show in my last letter; and the similarity is the more striking from the fact that most of the medieval treatises on the subject make a sevenfold division of Pride, as Lorenz does. For instance, in the tract found in Digby 20 and Rawl. poet. 241 we have:

"Orgoill est amur de propre hautesse (haut teste Dig.). De li neissent ces set: Inobedience encontre deu e encontre souerein . . . La secunde espece est lactance (definition of lactance). La terce espece est ypocrise (definition). La quarte espece est despit de autre (definition). La quinte espece est arrogance (definition). La sime espece est baudesoe (definition). La setime espece est elacion (definition)."

If the rest of MS. Bodley 90 were as similar to the Tale, we should have no difficulty in deciding the relation between the two; but this is unfortunately not the case. The likeness, as pointed out in my former letter, is rather in the method of treatment than verbal, though here and there similar forms of expression are found in both. In discussing Pride, as manifested in extravagant clothing, the French Sermon, unlike Lorenz' "Somme," goes into detail, and the Preacher presents his bill of particulars with the same vindictiveness that is found in Chaucer—e.g. (MS. Bodley 90, folio 3a):

"De fet* pecche home par orgoill . . in uesture des robes, sicome en robes trop precieuses selonc son estat, ou trop lungees, ou trop curtes, . . ou par orgoill taillez, ou estreitement recollez, ou attornez, ou trop delieuses, ou a superfluite, ceo est trop larges ou trop lungees, e ausi en chaucure ou en cheuals," &c.

The Preacher first addresses the men:

"Aus cheualers, uallex, esquires, clers e lais, seculers, ke tant de peine metez de vos acomer, e sornier, e en robes trop queintement taillez vos atornier e deuant au peitrin e a reredos recollees," &c.

Compare these passages with Person's Tale, I., §§ 413-430.

He then describes the extravagances of women's dress, but at much greater length than Chaucer. The conclusion he draws (fol. 4)—

"E les pources, Jesu Crist, uount nuz, & murunt de freit, ki pussent de la superfluite de vos robes estre reuestuz"— is an interesting parallel to Person's Tale, I., §§ 418-420.

The other cardinal sins are then treated in their order, each one followed by appropriate remedies. Then comes the part on Confession. Here we have again striking similarity of detail, and a divergence from the Somme, that is perhaps best illustrated in the following passage:

I. 983.—"First it (confession) moot been in sorwful bitterness of herte . . This condicioun of bitterness hath fyne signes.

"The firste is that confessioun moote be shamefast . ."

* The Preacher has just said that one can sin through pride in thought, word, and deed (de quor, de bouche, de fet).

I. 987.—"Another signe is humylitee in confessioun . . Right so sholde he humble his body outward to the preest that sit in goddes place."

I. 993.—"The thridde signe is, how that thy shrift sholde be ful of teeris, . ."

I. 995.—"The fourthe signe is, that he ne lotte not for shame to shewen his confession . ."

I. 996.—"The fiftie signe is that a man or a woman be obelant to receyuen the penance that hym is enloynd for his synnes . ."

The only real difference here is in the order of the last two "signes." Lorenz' treatment at this point is quite unlike Chaucer's (see Chaucer Society, Essays, part v., p. 587).

As I said in my last letter, the MS. breaks off abruptly in the midst of "Confession," though the rubrics and the prefixed analysis of the subject show that the original contained a full treatment, and probably also the logical third part found in the Person's Tale: namely, "Satisfaction."

The exact relation of Chaucer's "Tale" to these French sermons can only be determined by a careful comparison of the two. The few passages that I have given simply go to show that such a likeness exists, and are interesting as throwing fresh light on the question of Chaucer's source or sources, as it is quite possible that the "Tale" is a compilation from several, one of which may have been the original of this Bodley MS.

MARK LIDDELL.

DANTE'S USE OF "RENDERSI" (INF. XXVII. 83) AND "RENDUTO" (PURG. XX. 54).

Dorney Wood, Barham, Bucks.

In these two passages Dante appears to use the verb rendere in a special sense. In the former passage (Inf. xxvii. 83) Guido da Montefeltro says that when he approached the close of his life "pentuto e confesso mi rendei." Blanc in his Vocabolario Dantesco, taking the verb and the participle together, explains the phrase "rendersi pentuto" as equivalent to "pentirsi," and Scartazzini agrees with him; so that, according to this interpretation, Dante merely means Guido to say, "I repented and confessed."

If, however, we turn to the Italian commentators we find a different interpretation. For instance, Fraticelli and Brunone Bianchi, taking the verb absolutely, explain "mi rendei" as "mi feci frate," "I became a monk." And this is the interpretation of several of the old commentators. Thus, the Ottimo comments: "si fece frate minore"; Benvenuto da Imola: "dedicavi me Deo"; and so Vellutello and others. Mr. Vernon in his Readings on the "Inferno," states that Nannucci also (a weighty authority in a matter of this kind) was in favour of this interpretation.

The full expression would be "rendersi a Dio" or "a religione," the latter of which is used by Dante of Lancelot and Guido da Montefeltro in the Convivio (iv. 28), where he says that in their old age "a religione si rendero": i.e., entered a monastery. Another form of the expression was "rendersi monaco," or "rendersi frate." Thus, Villani, speaking of Louis, second son of Charles II. of Naples, who became a monk, says (vii. 95): "Si rendè frate minore, e poi fu vescovo di Tolosa"; and

"Li secund signe est humilitez, quant li hom vmblement se agenouille deuant seen confessor. . ."

"Li tierz signe, si sunt les lermes du pecchor."

"Li quart signe est quant home est preest de recevoir quele penance ke son confessor li vout enloindre."

"Li quinte signe est quant home ne lest pur nul honte ke il ne die tut hors son pecche apertement en sa confession."

of Childeric, the last of the Merovingians, he says (ii. 12): "era uomo di niuno valore, e rendesi monaco." The same phrase is used by Boccaccio in the Decameron (Giorn. iv., Nov. 6 ad. fin): "in un monistero assai famoso di santità la figliuola di Messer Negro e la sua fante monache si renderono."

In Purg. xx. 54 we get a parallel use of renduto, the term applied by Hugh Capet to the last of the "regi antichi" of France, who became a monk, renduto being used here in the same sense as the O. F. rendu, and the Provençal rendutz. A familiar example of the Old French word occurs in the Roman de la Rose, where Faux-Semblant, in his description of the various disguises he assumes, says:

"Autre ore sui religieuse,
Or sui rendus, or sui prieuse" (vv. 11,580-1), which in the Old English translation is rendered:

"Sometime I am religious,
Now lyk an anker in an hous."

Similarly, in the Roman de Renart a monastery is spoken of as "la maison as rendus." The word is common enough in this sense, as a reference to Godefroy will show.

Instances of the similar use of se rendre and rendutz in Provençal are given by Raynouard in his Lexique Roman; e.g.:

"Ella se rendet monga per la dolor que ella ac de lui e de la sua mort."

And again:

"Nos em fach hermitan Sentanta dos rendutz, e moiz preyres y a."

In medieval Latin rendutus and redditus were used in the same way, as may be seen in Du Cange.

The absolute use of rendersi in the special sense of "to become a monk" can also be paralleled in both Old French and Provençal—instances are supplied in plenty by Godefroy and Raynouard. It is probable, therefore, that what is after all the old interpretation of the above two passages of the "Divina Commedia" is the correct one, in spite of modern "commentatori forestieri." PAGET TOYNBEE.

THE LATE MR. E. R. WHARTON.

London: June 15, 1893.

Though my acquaintance with the late Mr. Wharton extended only to companionship with his wife and himself in a voyage across the Atlantic, I should like to bear my testimony to the remarkable impression produced by his personality on a stranger. Notwithstanding what you so fitly describe as his taciturn habits and his apparently cynical manner, no one could be in his company without recognising in him a man of uncommon power. It may be worth noting that Mr. Wharton was a remarkable draught player. This appeared, indeed, to be his only recreation when on board. He would play with any one who challenged him; and, if my memory serves me right, he did not lose a game during the voyage.

PHILOLOGICAL BOOKS.

Handbuch der Neugriechischen Volkssprache. Von Dr. Albert Thumb. (Williams & Norgate.) This book consists of three parts—a grammar of the popular modern Greek language, specimens of the literature which is composed in that language, and a glossary. The author tells us that his object in compiling it is twofold: first, to help to introduce readers to the popular literature of modern Greece; and, secondly, to communicate to philologists the principles of the development of the language. The position which he maintains as his starting point is that, independently of the numerous modern Greek dialects on the one hand, and of the Hellenising style of most modern prose writers on the other, there exists a popular spoken Greek language, which passes current everywhere. Few persons who have had sufficient opportunities of observation will doubt this, for they will have found such a language in use in Marseilles and Trieste, and Alexandria and Smyrna, and wherever else educated Greeks are found: and this is the old, traditional modern Greek tongue. Dr. Thumb has aimed at embodying in his work the results of the latest linguistic inquiries about this language, especially those of Prof. Hatzidakis, of Athens, to whom he acknowledges that he is greatly indebted. From this point of view his treatment of the phonology is remarkably complete. He not only describes the modern pronunciation, but notes also the changes, both regular and irregular, which have taken place from the sounds of the ancient language, and appends remarks on the peculiarities of usage which are found in many of the modern dialects. In dealing with the inflections he starts, not from the scheme of declensions and conjugations which existed in ancient Greek, but from the present forms without reference to their origin. Afterwards he shows in each case how the original forms, from whatever source derived, have passed into those which we find at the present day, and explains how the modern declensions are composed of words originally differing in declension, which have fallen together by assimilation or by some form of analogy or confusion. The method thus employed, while it is strictly scientific, will come as a surprise to those readers who are accustomed to the paradigms given in the ordinary Hellenising grammars. The usefulness of this part of Dr. Thumb's work is greatly increased by the ample lists of examples and of exceptions which are given. Students of the dialects will find here also a large amount of valuable material. The writer himself modestly says that his remarks on these are mainly confined to what is necessary for the explanation of the literature introduced in the latter part of the volume; but in reality they cover a much larger field. His investigations of that subject have been indefatigable; for they include the dialects not only of most of the districts in the neighbourhood of the Aegean, but also of the Greek settlements in South Italy, of those on the northern coast of Asia Minor, where Dr. Thumb resided for some time during 1884, and even of the Greek-speaking villages in Cappadocia, the discovery of whose existence dates from quite a recent period. As an interesting specimen of the information thus obtained, we may mention that the infinitive mood, which has perished everywhere else, survives in the dialect of Pontus. Altogether this grammar is a very complete piece of work, and far superior to anything that has hitherto appeared on the subject. The specimens of the modern literature, too, which are taken entirely from writers who use the popular language, are excellently chosen.

Among them we find some of the best popular songs and popular stories, poems and tales by some of the most cultivated writers whom Greece has produced—including Rhegas, Solomos, Zalamostas, and Valaorites from the earlier period, and Paraschos and Drosinos of our own time—and a number of compositions in peculiar dialects, such as those of South Italy, that of Samsoun on the northern coast of Asia Minor, and—most difficult of all—the Tzaconian dialect from the east of Laconia. The unfamiliar words which occur in these are explained in the glossary.

Ein mittellenglisches Medizinbuch. Herausgegeben von Fritz Heinrich. (Halle: Niemeyer.) This is a collection of medical receipts, printed literatim from Add. MS., 33,986 (which the editor assigns to about the year 1440), with collations of five other British Museum MSS. at the foot of the page. The text is of some linguistic value, and the editor deserves credit for the pains which he has bestowed on the transcription; but in other respects his work is not very satisfactory. There is no glossary, and the few notes, which are for the most part purely lexical, are by no means always correct. Among the words marked with a note of interrogation as unintelligible are saundyver (for which see Stratmann-Bradley), vdellium (clearly for bdellium), pentours (painters), and philipendule (which, with the correct spelling filipendule, is found in many dictionaries). Ned ys (= need is) is explained as standing for "ne it is"; wolfes festes (Lycoperdon) is rendered "Wolfsfaust"; thonwonges (the hollow under the temples) is interpreted "upper lip"; saundres, sandal-wood, is identified with the plant called alisanders; and ganates grece (apparently "gannet's grease") is said to mean gnat's grease (!). "Mückenfett (ein nooh jetzt gebräuhlicher Ausdruck)." One or two spurious Old English forms are cited, and in the identification of plants the editor shows that he has no adequate notion of the extreme looseness with which popular names are used. Herr Heinrich is evidently a novice; we hope that his future work will prove that he is capable of learning.

THE DERIVATION OF "EBAL."

Manuscript College, Oxford: June 1, 1896.

Hebrew lexicons (e.g., Gesenius' Thesaurus and the new edition of the Handwörterbuch by Buhl) assume a Hebrew root עִבֵּל to explain the proper names עִבְלָא and עִיבֵּל; the latter is best known as the name of the mountain of cursing, Mount Ebal, but is also the name of a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23). Dr. Winckler, in his recent very suggestive work, Geschichte Israels (p. 120), has drawn attention to the Greek transliteration of the name in the latter connexion—Γαβηλ, hinting that the name, together with one or two others, may be the results of the worship, at an early period, in Palestine, of the Assyrian Bel. Certain considerations favour this view, and at the same time justify us in questioning whether the root עִבֵּל was ever current among the Hebrews.

(1) The form עִיבֵּל is in all probability a mere textual error for עִבֵּל; the confusion in transcription of י and ל was, as is well known, exceedingly frequent. עִיבֵּל is read only in Gen. x. 28; in the parallel passage, 1 Chron. i. 22, we read עִיבֵּל. The Greek in no case supports the word, but Lucian (Γαβηλ, Gen.; Ηβηλ, Chron.) supports the yod. The yod is also the reading of the Samaritan text in Genesis. The evidence for the root עִבֵּל rests, then, at best on a single form—עִיבֵּל.

(2) No trace of the root עִבֵּל is, I think, to be found in Aramaic; neither Payne Smith (in the Thesaurus Syriacus) nor Buxtorf (in the Lexicon Chaldaicum) cites such a root. Of the two possible Arabic equivalents of the supposed Hebrew root, 'abala occurs, ghabala does not—at least, is not cited in Lisān al Arab. עִיבֵּל has, therefore, been interpreted by comparison with the Arabic 'abala to mean "rock" (Gesenius, Thesaurus). This is most hazardous. "Rock" appears to be anything but the primitive sense of the Arabic parallels. An even more serious objection lies against the legitimacy of the comparison. The Septuagint transliteration invariably in the Pentateuch—the part of the Old Testament earliest translated, and therefore our oldest testimony to Hebrew pronunciation—gives ר as the equivalent of the initial ע. This renders it extremely probable that the Hebrew ע corresponds to the Arabic ghain, not 'ain, and leaves us, therefore, without Arabic or Aramaic support for the hypothetical Hebrew root עִבֵּל.

(3) The alternatives to עִיבֵּל being derivative from a root עִבֵּל are (a) that it is a non-Semitic word, (b) that it is a compound name. Against the first is the presence of the peculiarly Semitic guttural ע. What positive reasons can be found for the second? If compound, the name clearly consists of the two parts עִי and בֵּל; for the latter as an element in compound Palestinian names we have one tolerably certain parallel in מִשְׁכֵּל (LXX. Αεβηλ); less certain and, to my thinking, not very probable parallels in בִּלְעָם and רִמְבֵּל (assumed on the ground of the equivalent in Syriac and Josephus to be the original of רִמְבֵּל). Uncompounded בֵּל (LXX. βηλ) occurs in two or three Old Testament passages as the name of the Babylonian deity. The element עִי does not occur in other compounds, but occurs with the article prefixed as the name of the well-known city Ai. The invariable prefixing of the article indicates that עִי is not primarily a proper name, but an appellative (cf. הַרְבֵּעָה); into its meaning I need not here inquire, though the current interpretation, "ruin," is far from being unquestionable. It must suffice to point out that, if in the name of the city it is defined by the article, in another instance it might quite suitably be determined by a following genitive—"Bel." The identity of עִי in עִיבֵּל and עִיבֵּל gains likelihood from the identity in the Greek transliterations: עִיבֵּל is Γαβηλ (or Γαβηλ), עִיבֵּל is Αγγα or Γα (with or without the Greek feminine article throughout the Pentateuch; only in the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, which were translated later, do we meet with the transliterations Αια, Αι. I propose, therefore, as the meaning of עִיבֵּל, "The . . . of Bel." There are difficulties, no doubt, in this view. Why should the LXX. only in two cases preserve the e vowel of the second syllable—which is, on this view, the correct one—and in all other cases agree with the erroneous a vowel of the Massoretes? But these difficulties are hardly greater than the assumption for a single name of an otherwise unknown Semitic root. Possibly, having raised the question by bringing together the above facts, I may elicit from others further facts which may decide the question in the one sense or the other.

If it can be proved that עִיבֵּל in all cases—and not only in the case of the Horite, as suggested by Dr. Winckler—is compounded with the name of the Babylonian deity, we shall have added one other to the numerous traces that have been discovered of early Babylonian influence over the religion of Palestine.

"THE RESTORED PRONUNCIATION OF GREEK."

Cardiff: June 12, 1896.

I cannot but think that Prof. Arnold and I have a right to complain of the manner in which Dr. Lloyd conducts his controversy against us. Throughout our correspondence he has been treated, we hope and believe, in spite of some peculiarities in his letters, with the courtesy due to a serious critic. A few instances from his last two letters will enable your readers to judge how far it is now possible to regard him in that light.

1. Being challenged on the subject by Dr. Lloyd, I cited passages from our pamphlet to prove that it explicitly leaves full discretion to the teacher to postpone any of the reforms we advocate. This proof Dr. Lloyd persistently represents as a change of attitude, charging us with "now" accepting "compromises" upon what we "then enjoined ex cathedra."

2. Brugmann states that the transcription of  $\phi, \chi$  by  $t, p, c$  at "Rome" (bei den Römern) proves that the explosive element survived "at the time of the transcription" (noch). Though this passage was quoted and translated in my letter, Dr. Lloyd allows himself to write that "it contains no reference to date."

3. In our first letter, Prof. Arnold and I answered a remark of Dr. Lloyd's first letter, by giving our reasons for holding the fifth century pronunciation to be more convenient for teaching purposes. To these reasons Dr. Lloyd offered no answer whatever, though he twice alluded to the matter, the second time without expressing dissent from our view. From his silence I inferred that Dr. Lloyd had changed his opinion, and therefore wrote (ACADEMY, May 9): "We observe that Dr. Lloyd tacitly admits the objection we urged in a former letter to the Demosthenic pronunciation, &c. It may be taken, then, that the points he wishes us to discuss refer to the age of Pericles." In quoting this passage Dr. Lloyd omits the words I have now italicised, and refers "the impartial reader" to his earliest letter to convict me of misrepresenting him.

I am sorry that I missed the ACADEMY of March 28, with Dr. Lloyd's longer pronouncement as to  $\zeta$ . But under the circumstances I do not think that the controversy can be profitably continued on this or any other point. I leave all Dr. Lloyd's statements to any reader who may care to examine them.

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE council of the London Mathematica Society have awarded the De Morgan Memorial medal to Mr. Samuel Roberts. The presentation will take place at the annual meeting to be held in November next. The award is made triennially; the previous recipients have been Profs. Cayley and Sylvester, Lord Rayleigh, and Prof. F. Klein.

THE Chemical Society has presented an address to Prof. Stanislao Cannizzaro, founder and director of the Chemical Institute at Rome, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, which will be celebrated next month. Prof. Cannizzaro has been a foreign member of the Chemical Society for thirty-four years, and delivered the Faraday lecture in 1872. At Rome, it is proposed to strike a medal commemorative of the occasion, and to found in perpetuity a Cannizzaro prize.

On Saturday of this week, there will be an excursion of the Geologists' Association to Hitchin, under the direction of Mr. W. Hill and Mr. H. W. Monckton. In particular, a visit will be paid to certain clay pits, to inspect a calcareous deposit—probably lacustrine—with recent freshwater shells, ostracods and chara seeds, overlain in places by twenty feet of brick-earth, in which palaeolithic implements occur.

THE usual conversazione of the Institution of Electrical Engineers, of which Dr. John Hopkinson is president for this year, will be held on Thursday next, in the galleries of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Piccadilly.

THE President of the Board of Trade has appointed a committee, consisting of the following: Lord Blythwood (chairman), Sir Benjamin Baker, Sir J. Lowthian Bell, Prof. Wyndham Dunstan, Prof. A. B. W. Kennedy, Major F. A. Marindin, Mr. E. P. Martin, Prof. W. C. Roberts-Austen, Dr. T. E. Thorpe, Prof. W. C. Unwin, and Mr. E. Windsor Richards, to inquire as to the extent of loss of strength in steel rails produced by their prolonged use on railways under varying conditions, and what steps can be taken to prevent the risk of accidents arising through such loss of strength. Mr. W. F. Marwood, of the Board of Trade, has been nominated to act as secretary to the committee.

DR. ROUX, sub-director of the Pasteur Institute, has been elected an associate of the Académie de Médecine, in the room of Pasteur.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

PROF. EARLE is writing an elementary grammar, under the title A Simple Grammar of English now in use.

MR. DAVID NUTT has issued a classified catalogue of books in all departments of Semitic philology and literature, numbering 1442 lots in all. They comprise the library of the late Prof. Bensley of Cambridge (excluding the Syriac works, which now form part of the University Library), and a selection from the library of the late John Owen, rector of East Anstey.

THE first number has appeared of Leuvenache Bijdragen, edited by Prof. Ph. Colinet, C. Leconte and W. Bang of the University of Louvain, and M. L. Goemans of the Royal Athenaeum of the same place. The journal is devoted to Germanic philology in general, and to the study of the Netherlandish dialects in particular. The first number contains a phonetic historical study of the dialect of Aalst, by M. Colinet; a description of a MS. in the town library of Bruges by M. L. Scharpe; and a survey of periodicals containing papers on Netherlandish philology by Prof. Leconte.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

CLIFTON SHAKSPERE SOCIETY.—(Saturday, May 23.)

ARTHUR S. WAY, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. Way, in a paper on "A Woman Killed with Kindness," said that we find in Thomas Heywood's writings the style of a man who, with no affectation of grandeur or sublimity, no self-delusions about smartness or thrilling effect, knows what he can do, and does it as often as he pleases. He possesses, like so many of his contemporary dramatists, that strange unexpectedness of suddenly soaring on the wings of passion into heights of poetry far above the pedestrian level of his ordinary walk. There are touches of pathos, there are rhapsodies of heart music, there are organ-tones of pain in the play under consideration which make us feel that he is a man who has it in him to tread the same mountain tops and breathe the same fine air as the mightiest of those who made the spacious times of great Elizabeth resonant with song. Marlowe need not have blushed to be credited with the lyric cadence of that despairing appeal:

"Fair and of all beloved, I was not fearful Bluntly to give my life into your hand,
And at one hazard all my earthly means.
Go, tell your husband; he will turn me off,
And I am then undone. I care not, I;
'Twas for your sake. Perchance in rage he'll kill me:

I care not; 'twas for you. Say I incur
The general name of villain through the world,
Of traitor to my friend, I care not, I.
Beggary, shame, death, scandal, and reproach,
For you I'll hazard all, why, what care I?
For you I'll live and in your love I'll die."

Shakspeare might without derogation to his glory have owned for his that thrilling cry, "O God! O God! that it were possible to undo things done," though he would not have watered his wine by the feeble amplification of the thoughts which follow. —This meeting brought to an end the work of the society's twenty-first session. The plays chosen for next session are "As You Like It," "The London Prodigal," "Twelfth Night," "Julius Caesar," "A Yorkshire Tragedy," "Hamlet," "The Silent Woman." The hon. secretary (9, Gordon-road, Clifton, Bristol) will gratefully acknowledge the receipt of anything for the society's library, which now consists of 600 volumes.

ARCHAEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE.—(Wednesday, June 3.)

JUDGE BAYLIS, vice-president, in the chair.—Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland read a paper on the Fitzwilliam (commonly called Queen Elizabeth's) Virginal Book. Mr. Maitland prefaced his remarks by showing that, just as restoration in various branches of archaeology was so frequently applied whereby the originality was destroyed, so editors until lately were accustomed to restore ancient music in obedience to the taste of an audience accustomed to modern music, and not in accordance with the rules that were in force at the period of origin. Scientific principles being now adopted by musical antiquaries, editions of the classics of various countries are being prepared with such care and accuracy as to rank among literary masterpieces. It has also been possible of late years to reconstruct the old musical instruments, whereby the compositions of the last 300 years at least may be performed exactly as they were heard by contemporaries. The author described the Virginal Book in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, as a MS. of music composed between the years 1562 and 1621, and written for the virginal, an instrument intended for the use of young ladies. He pointed out, however, that there seemed to be no foundation for the surmise that the English name of the instrument was given in honour of the virgin Queen Elizabeth, and equally baseless is the traditional title of the book. Of the composers of this collection, Peter Philipps is most largely represented. Mr. Maitland divided the music into four classes; namely, variations on the plain chant of the church, variations on secular tunes, fantasias, and dance movements. Having briefly described the mechanism of the virginal kindly lent for the occasion by Mr. Dolmetch as being a fine specimen of a sixteenth century instrument of Italian make, Mr. Maitland concluded his paper by performing compositions taken from the MS. and illustrating the four classes of music already described.

PHILOLOGICAL.—(Friday, June 5.)

HENRY BRADLEY, Esq., vice-president, in the chair.—Prof. Skeat read a paper on "The Text of Wyclif's Bible," and on "Ghostwords in Poems once attributed to Chaucer." In Wyclif's two versions of the Bible, as printed in the splendid edition of the Clarendon Press by Forshall & Madden, it happens that there is no table of contents; nor is it possible to find what MSS. were used for the text without frequent reference to the preface, where three passages have to be compared. The MSS. used for the text of the Earlier Version (not counting in the Prologues) are those marked A, B, C, K, M. The later text is all from A. Besides these, a large number of MSS. were used in the text of the Prologues; so that, in all, twenty-one MSS. are employed for it—namely, a, e; A, B, C, G, K, M, S, V; a, k, o, p, w, y, z; A, M, O, R. MSS. marked with italic letters belong to the earlier text. Besides these, many more MSS. were collated, and are mentioned in the footnotes. With the exception of C and S (which have present participles in -ende and -ande, and employ the pronouns ther and them instead of her and hem), nearly all the MSS. exhibit a uniform dialect, being the same form of Midland as that employed in Peck's Repressor (see the extract in Specimens of English from 1394 to 1579, ed. Skeat). Its chief characteristics are the use of the suffixes -ith, -ide, -id (as well as -eth, -ede, -ed), where the London scribes usually have -eth, -ede, -ed only. All these MSS. evidently proceeded from the same scriptorium.—Prof. Skeat then proceeded to instance some curious words occurring in poems originally associated with Chaucer. (1) Bailey has "Momblishness, talk, muttering (Old Word)." The form in Thynne is really momblynesse, in "The Assembly of Ladies," st. 9. The MS. reading is ne moublynesse (= ne m'oublynesse), which means "forget-me-nots." The word occurs in a list of flowers. (2) In Lydgate's "Flour of Ourtesye," l. 195, Thynne prints setres, to rhyme with An-ti-gone, read as a trisyllable. But the right name is Antigone, requiring the rhyme setres, which is merely miswritten for seures, and means "reticent." (3) Lydgate's "Black Knight" has (l. 419) the words "in partyng of lyfe." This merely mean that "n" has been written for "u." Read "inpartyng," that is hazardous. The Douce MS. has inpartyng, the other MSS. are wrong.—(4) Stowe, in printing a ballad on "Woman's Doubtfulness," has the line, "Of lombes, as in sothfastnesse," which makes nonsense. The Fairfax MS. has ambes as, "double as," the lowest throw of the dice, giving the sense required. Not knowing ambes, Stowe put an i before it, and a comma after it. (5) In Lydgate's "Balade to our Lady" (l. 127), the poet calls the Virgin Mary a probatyf piscyne, as Thynne prints it. But probatyf should be probatyk: see probatia piscina, a sheep-washing pool, in the Vulgate Version of John v. 2. The reference is to the pool of Bethesda. (The true reading has since been found by Prof. Skeat in a Sloane MS.)

ANTHROPOLOGICAL.—(Tuesday, June 9.)

G. W. BRABROOK, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. H. W. Seton-Karr exhibited some flint implements from the Egyptian Desert and from Somaliland, with interesting photographs of the latter country. In the discussion which followed Mr. Charles H. Read, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Rudler took part.—Mr. O. S. Myers read a paper on "Some Skulls Discovered at Brandon, in Suffolk," some of which he exhibited.—Dr. Garson, Prof. Thane, Prof. Haddon, Mr. Holmes, and Dr. Beddoe spoke.—Dr. R. M. Connolly read a paper on "Social Life in Fanti-Land," illustrated by a collection of objects, and by the optical lantern.—General Robley exhibited a unique collection of fourteen tattooed Maori heads.

NAVY RECORDS SOCIETY.—(Annual Meeting, Thursday, June 11.)

EARL SPENCER, president, in the chair.—The council reported that the number of members on the list of the society was 523, being a net increase of 83 during the last twelve months. The society at the beginning of the present year had a clear balance of £428. In addition to the "Journal of Rear-Admiral Bartholomew James," already issued, it is proposed to issue during the present year "Holland's Two Discourses on the Navy, 1639 and 1660," edited by Mr. J. R. Tanner; and "Navy Accounts and Inventories under Henry VII.," edited by Mr. M. Oppenheim, both of which may be expected to throw much new light on the early administration of the Navy. The volumes for next year will probably be: "The Journal of Sir George Rooke, 1700-2," edited by Mr. Oscar Browning; Roll II. of Anthony's "Declaration of the Navy, 1546," edited by Prof. Elgar; and "Papers relating to the Blockade of Brest, 1803-5," edited by Mr. John Leyland. The society's volumes are issued only to subscribers; they are not offered for sale to the general public. The proposed changes in the council were agreed to, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the president.

FINE ART.

The Christ upon the Hill: a Ballad, by Cosmo Monkhouse. Etched by W. Strang. (Smith, Elder, & Co.)

It is an unusual, and we doubt if it is a desirable, thing to make so big a book as this out of the publication of a ballad. It is an excellent ballad, and Mr. Strang's etchings are, of course, clever ones. With whatever may be their deficiencies—the needless ungainliness of many a figure, for example—they are impressive in sentiment, charged fully with imagination, and accomplished in technique. And that is saying a great deal—much more than we could say, with honesty, for most work of illustration done now-a-days, when a level of mediocrity is all that is generally preserved, and nothing is very bad, and nothing very good, and the charm most looked for is the doubtful charm of the à peu près. We say the "doubtful charm," because while it may be conceded that in human beauty something of the attractiveness is due to the touch of imperfection—the suggestion of the potential rather than the positively realised—in Art of any kind, literary or pictorial, even in what is generally the humble art of illustration, our natural and legitimate demand is for positive excellence. I recollect that in a criticism of a little book of my own in which I had occasion to deal with Mr. Strang's general position as an etcher—a book called Etching in England—Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, who, to do him justice, did not find much to interest him in that volume, took exception particularly to my comparative lack of appreciation, or at all events to my comparative lack of exposition, of the imaginative side of Mr. Strang's art. One does not want to be for ever repeating one's self; and it so happens that years before I worked upon the book in question, in which I set myself to deal, in limited space, with a whole school and with several generations, I had hurried to express with great fulness, in a long and tiresome article, my extreme appreciation of the imaginative qualities of the work of Mr. Strang. Not even the placid reproaches addressed to me by Mr. Monkhouse in his review of the humble volume I have named will cause me to swerve from the line that I deliberately took. There is no need to swerve from it. The small public that is seriously interested in Etching may still doubt, or at least a part of it may doubt, Mr. Strang's charm; but his imaginative power and his skill in technique have, as I conjecture, long ceased to be questioned.

If we are to compare Mr. Strang's work in illustration of The Christ upon the Hill with his work in other quarters—and that, it seems to me, is the only comparison that is profitable—it must be said that, owing it may be in a measure to the fetters of the subject, it is less varied than is much of that other work. But, as of old, it is, as I have said, impressive. It is so wicked now—according to the newer lights—to say that anything is ugly, that I hesitate to think that it is ugly even now and then. Ungainly one may, perhaps, again venture to call some of it. It cannot possibly be more. And whatever it is, it is sincere, pious, technically as well as emotionally admirable, and—yes, Mr. Monkhouse, we will say it once again—stamped all over with the impress of imagination.

And now to turn for a moment to the facile and delightful ballad, which some of us would like in a form that we could carry in our waistcoat pockets—as you can carry Sebald Beham's prints, or a collection of sapphires, or a few notsukes to amuse you when there is nothing European anywhere about—but which it has pleased Mr. Monkhouse, or Mr. Strang, or his distinguished publisher, or an appalling, overwhelming combination of the three, to issue, magnificently indeed, but in a form of somewhat cumbersome largeness, so that the last time I went to Brighton I had to remember, as the principal items of my luggage, a port-manteau and The Christ upon the Hill. The ballad, then, has the directness, vividness, and simplicity which are, in this species of composition, the indispensable requirements for excellence. There is from end to end of it nothing whatever of the amateur—no trace whatever of the halting or enfeebled or unpractised hand. And there is, to boot, in the treatment of the simple yet imaginative tale—a tale it is not necessary nor, perhaps, even desirable to here unfold—something more than simplicity, directness, vividness. Here and there, there is a touch of wizardry: something has crept into it, weird, compelling, extraordinarily influential, yet inexplicable. I wish I could define it better, or define it more. But it is just a touch that recalls Coleridge.

EXPLORATIONS IN EASTERN CRETE.

II.—A "TOWN OF CASTLES."

Ashmolean Museum, Oxford: June 11.

The great days of Crete were those of which we still find a reflection in the Homeric poems—the period of Mycenaean culture, to which here at least we would fain attach the name "Minoan." Nothing more continually strikes the archaeological explorer of its ancient remains than the comparative paucity and unimportance of the relics of the historic period. The monuments and coinage of some few cities—such as Gortyna or Phoenos—supply, indeed, a series of brilliant, if fitful, exceptions; but the picturesque originality which is the prevailing feature of such classical art as here flourished is itself a witness to the general isolation of the Cretan cities from the rest of the Hellenic world. The golden age of Crete lies far beyond the limits of the historical period: its culture not only displays within the three seas an uniformity never afterwards attained, but is practically identical with that of the Peloponnese and a large part of the Aegean world. Communications were infinitely more regular and extended; the density of the population, supported by both agriculture and maritime enterprise, was far superior to that of any later period of Cretan history. It was, indeed, the island of the "Hundred Cities."

These strong impressions, already forced upon me by two earlier explorations of Eastern and Central Crete, led me to hope that, in spite of recent researches, many early cities still remained to be discovered, even in the now largely investigated Eastern Provinces. During my recent journey I was able not only to obtain additional data regarding several of the known prehistoric sites, such as the temenos on Mount Jukta, and the great city of Goulàs, but also to discover the remains of nine hitherto unknown centres of primeval population, besides a whole series of more scattered habitations of the same "Cyclopean" character. Most of these remains, of which I cannot here give more than a summary indication, lay on the spurs or in the glens of Dikta, in its widest sense—that is to say, both the ranges of Lasethi, to which this ancient name was applied by the Lyttians, and those of Siteia, in the extreme east of the island, where it was equally located by the Proesians and their neighbours.

The district to which I first devoted my attention, and to which I will confine this letter, was the range that forms the northern rampart of Lasethi, where, on a height known as Hagios Georgios, I found what seems to have been the principal civic centre of its upland plain. Here were more or less continuous walls of uncemented masonry and many foundations of primitive houses, while the fragments of pottery which strewed the ground showed that the settlement had lived into the archaic Greek period. About half-an-hour's climb above this, near a windy gap, marked by some ruinous windmills, is a knoll called Papoura, overlooking to the west the whole lowland district of Pedesada and what was once the civic territory of Lyttos. Here are abundant traces of a votive cult, which seems to have continued unbroken from early Mycenaean to late Hellenic times. The ground was strewn with fragments of terra-cotta figures, some of which, belonging to the fourth and fifth centuries B.C., had been recently discovered in the remains of a clay chest. From this spot, together with a simple, owl-like female, of terra-cotta—such as would have delighted Schliemann—I procured a bronze Mycenaean figure of a man with his arms folded over his breast, and some fragments of small clay reliefs, belonging to the archaic and transitional periods of Greek art, representing a type of Athena with a curiously crested head-gear and a Kourotrophos of Isis-like pose. Hard by was a Mycenaean tholos tomb, turned into a shepherd's shelter. On the height above, called Koprana, about half-an-hour's climb above Papoura, I found the remains of a primeval akropolis. Its principal building consisted of two megara side by side, of huge blocks in rudely horizontal layers—one stone measuring two metres in length, 0·60 m. in height, and 0·80 m. in depth. Beyond the akropolis height to the west rises a natural limestone tower—a kind of broken aiguille—called Korphè, overlooking the Omphalian plain and a large part of central Crete as far as Cape Dia. Here, on the cliff below, by putting the ear to a small crevice in the rock, may be heard the sound of subterranean waters, whence, in all probability, the inhabitants of this now waterless height drew their supply by means of an underground passage or syrtis like that described by Tsountas at Mycenae. In the same way at Kastri, near Turloti—an early akropolis explored by me in the province of Siteia—a peasant, while excavating a cistern near the summit, came quite recently upon rock stairs descending deep into the ground, and doubtless connected with the ancient water supply. A partly artificial cleft, between the limestone spur above mentioned and the upper platform of the akropolis height, further indicated that there had been an exterior staircase out in the precipitous northern flank of the mountain, affording access from that direction. In a kind of natural theatre on the south-western side, enclosed between the rock bastions of Korphè and the main mass of Koprana, are traces of the supporting walls of terraces, and a whole group of beehive tombs about six feet high internally, some of which I excavated. They had evidently been robbed in ancient times; but I was able to establish the existence of clay chests, or ladrakas, containing the bones of the deceased, such as have been found in Mycenaean interments in many parts of Crete, besides pitthoi and other vessels of typical forms. Fragments of more primitive pottery, like that of the Second City of Troy, and an early three-sided seal from the akropolis show that the beginnings of this settlement go back to pre-Mycenaean times.

At a spot called Omalès, about three hours' distant from this, on a northern spur of Mount Selena, I heard of other ancient ruins, which, like many others throughout the island, are known to the Romaic population as 'ora 'Eλληνικά—"the heathen" remains. A difficult path along limestone steepes brought me to the spot; and here, in a wilderness of rock, beneath an ilex wood, where the Cretan wild-goat is still occasionally seen, was one of the most interesting primitive settlements that it has ever been my fortune to explore. It might be described as a "town of castles." The whole consists of a group of "Cyclopean" strongholds, all within hail of one another, each of which, built on its own rock-knoll, with its walled enclosure approached by a fortified ramp, and its inner passages and divisions, might be described as an akropolis in miniature.

Of these I had time to explore six; but I heard of others not far off. The largest of these Phouria—perhaps the "mother" stronghold of the settlement—known as Monasteraki, from a ruined Byzantine church built in one of its chambers, was of very massive polygonal blocks, probably belonging to the more primitive "Aegean" period; in other cases the construction showed a rude approach to horizontal layers, and was more distinctively "Mycenaean." One of the Phouria belonging to this latter class possessed a feature of exceptional interest. To the left of the entrance ramp, the outer wall of the stronghold bulged out in a semicircular form; and on the external face of this were small openings, which proved to be the dromoi of beehive tombs within. The same phenomenon was observable on the north-eastern wall; and here marauders had thrown out the contents of a ruined tholos within, consisting of red pottery of rustic Mycenaean type, like much of that of Koprana. This system of "intra-mural" interment in its most literal sense—of which I was afterwards to find other examples in Eastern Crete—is of the highest interest, and the parallel of the tombs within the semi-circular bay of wall and the akropolis graves of Mycenae cannot be overlooked. It seems probable that the Spartan practice of burial within the city was rooted in a widely spread Mycenaean usage, of which we here see a very rudimentary version. For the "Town of Castles" itself—this primitive ορεικίον in fortified dwellings, isolated, yet holding together—one is tempted to seek a humbler comparison in the groups of detached tower-houses that form the villages of Upper Albania.

Resuming my investigations on the northern borders of the upland plain of Lasethi, I found near the village of Tsermiado slight traces of an ancient akropolis on a table-headed height called Kastéli, below which, at a spot known, from a curious conglomerate formation, as Καβαλλόπες Βέλαρες ("the riding-stones"), fragments of a large Mycenaean pitthos which had served as an ossuary. It had been found intact, with several skulls inside—probably within the remains of a tholos—but both tomb, jar, and contents had been forthwith broken up. On a cliff above this, at a spot called Trapeza, I was pointed out a cave where bones and pottery were also said to be found. With the aid of some of the villagers I accordingly made an exploratory excavation. We dug in two places in the lower of two stalagmitic chambers, which was not more than 12 feet in diameter. The floor here and throughout the cave was strewn with human bones and fragments of pottery—the result of earlier "tumultuary" grubbing on the part of the peasants. My dig produced many similar relics, the pottery mostly of primitive "Aegean" bucchero, though one fragment of a late Greek cup with metallic lustre was also brought to light. More interesting were some steatite beads and pieces of gold ornaments, including a gold tube and two leaf-shaped pendants of Mycenaean date, together with part of a miniature votive double axe, of a type identical with those found both in the Diktaean and Idaean caves of Zeus. On a peak which rises above the southern margin of the plain below the main summit of Lasethi, but known like it by the name of Aphendi Christos, I heard of the discovery not long since of an apparently votive deposit of bronze weapons, described as similar to those found in such quantities in the Cave of Psychro (Diktaion Antron). It looks as if in all these cases we had to deal with the same primeval cult of the Cretan Zeus-Minós, and the later assimilation of the surviving religio loci to that of "Christ the Lord" is very suggestive. The highest summit of the more easterly range of Dikta, in which lay the temple of the Diktaean Zeus, also bears the name of Aphendi Vouno. Under the same guise the old sanctity of the spot has been prolonged on Mount Jukta, where tradition placed "the tomb of Zeus." Here, within a massive temenos formed of roughly horizontal blocks, a steep, strewn with remains of small vessels that seem to attest the continual flow of votaries from Mycenaean to Roman times, leads to the now hardly distinguishable foundations of what may have been a Holy Sepulchre of remote antiquity. A little further on the ridge outside the heathen enclosure is perched a small church, here, too, dedicated to the Aphendi Christos.

The abiding piety of the land of Minós has simply transferred its devotion from the giver of the old law on Ida to the giver of the new.

EXPLORATIONS AT THEBES.

Derhabyeh, "Budd'er Grange," Cairo: June 1, 1896.

FOR the past fourteen months I have been living at Thebes, copying certain of the private tombs there and making a thorough exploration of the necropolis, with somewhat surprising results. From time to time, ever since Pococke first explored the ancient capital of the country, Egyptologists have been busy there; and many European scholars, such as Champollion, Rosellini, Wilkinson, Lepsius, Ebers, and Brugsch Pasha, have chosen the necropolis as their centre for investigations on the western side. Yet it is astonishing to find how little really systematic work has been done, and how little is known of perhaps the most interesting and instructive part of Thebes—its private tombs.

During my explorations there I have catalogued and classified nearly 200 inscribed tombs, of which perhaps only eighty were previously recorded. In no case, I should mention, have I opened out a new tomb—the above number merely represents those accessible to the public at the beginning of 1895. Many of the previously unrecorded tombs contain scenes and inscriptions of great interest; and it would seem that the reason why they have until now escaped notice is that they are for the most part inhabited, and have been for years, by the fellahin and antiquity dealers of Gourneh. The natives have, as a rule, a great objection to their houses being inspected by Europeans, especially the inner apartments, which are generally occupied by the harim and since a government permit has to be obtained for digging for antiquities, another reason has arisen for their dislike to be visited by Europeans. Not being allowed to dig in the open, they tunnel in at the back of the tombs which they inhabit, till they come upon others untouched. I have myself crawled along many tunnels thus formed (one for a distance of at least 200 yards) connecting several tombs now rifled. Doubtless there are many others that have escaped my notice. Living as I did during the late spring and early summer of last year in the village of Gourneh, Mrs. Newberry and myself did our best to cultivate the acquaintance of the natives, inviting them to visit us, and then, of course, returning their calls, with the result that, after a time, we became so friendly that even the "inner chambers" of the tombs in which they resided were thrown open to us.

Among our finds I may perhaps be allowed to note here a few of the most interesting, confining myself to those of the period of the XVIIIth Dynasty.

Of the early period of that Dynasty may be noted the tomb of a steward of Amenhetep I., others of important personages of the reign of Queen Hatshepsut, including that of one of her vezirs, and another of the engineer employed by her to superintend the cutting of the two great obelisks at Karnak.

Of the reign of Thothmes III. we have the tombs of: (1) a Prince of Thebes; (2) the king's chief steward; (3) a superintendent of his storehouse; (4) his privy seal, and (5 and 6) that officer's wakils; (7) a superintendent of the countries of the north; (8) an unrecorded vezir of this reign; and (9) the king's chief herald and scribe of the soldiers.

Of the succeeding reigns of this great dynasty I may note the tombs of: (1) a Prince of Thebes, (2) a superintendent of the garden of the temple of Amen, (3) a "cabinet" minister, and (4) a chief of the police under Amenhetep II.; (5) a privy seal, (6) vezir, and (7) Prince of the Fayum under Thothmes IV.; and (8) a steward of the king in Thebes under Amenhetep III.

During my stay at Thebes I also made a complete copy of the great tomb of Rekhmara, a task which occupied some six months' hard work on ladders and by candle light. This I hope to publish next winter or spring.

In the early spring of last year I checked all the published inscriptions of Assiut, made plans, &c., of the tombs, and copied the scenes and inscriptions in three hitherto unpublished tombs there. One of the latter is important, as it enables me to connect the Heracleopolite family of princes with that of the Hepzefas of the XIIth Dynasty.

OBITUARY.

JOHN HENRY MIDDLETON.

WE regret to record the death, under sad circumstances, of Dr. J. H. Middleton, one of the leading authorities on art and archaeology in this country. During nearly all his life his health was infirm, and for the last two or three years he had suffered from extreme nervous depression. He died on June 10, at his residence in the South Kensington Museum, from an overdose of morphia.

John Henry Middleton was born at York in 1846. His boyhood was mostly spent in Italy, in company with his father, who was an architect. After a short period of school-time at Cheltenham, where his father was then practising his profession, he matriculated as a commoner at Exeter College, Oxford, in 1865. But he left the university without taking a degree, and forthwith travelled alone for several years in different parts of the world.

At one time he was heard of in Mexico; at another he paid an adventurous visit to the great Mahommedan university at Fez. Italy he knew thoroughly from end to end; he had studied the architecture of Spain, both Moorish and Gothic; and he was at home at Cairo.

These Wanderjahre were the formative influence on his subsequent life. He came back to England with an unrivalled knowledge of the history of medieval art, gained from living among its masterpieces. For a time he practised architecture, first as assistant to his father, and afterwards as the inheritor of his business. But the bent of his career was given by Robertson Smith, who possessed the faculty not only of picking his men, but also of getting out of them the utmost amount of work. Middleton is said to have contributed to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica no less than eighty-two articles, on subjects connected with art and archaeology.

The second period of his life was spent at Cambridge, where he succeeded Mr. Sidney Colvin as Slade professor of fine art in 1886. He rapidly acquired a great reputation, and made many friends both among the older and the younger men. In 1888, he was elected to a fellowship at King's College; in 1889, he was appointed director of the Fitzwilliam Museum; and in 1892, he was approved by the general board of studies for the degree of Doctor of Letters. His own university conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. at the Encaenia of 1894. At Cambridge he enjoyed congenial work, and sufficient leisure to allow him to pay frequent visits to his loved Italy. Nothing pleased him more than to conduct parties round the ruins of ancient Rome, and make every stone tell its lesson. It was at Rome that he met his wife, a daughter of Mr. W. J. Stillman, to whom he was married in 1892.

When Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen died in 1893, it was decided to separate the two departments of science and art which make up the South Kensington Museum; and Middleton was appointed to the new office of art director. No doubt, the great attraction to him was the large sum of money annually placed at his disposal for the purchase of art treasures. But the office also demanded heavy administrative duties, to which his temperament and his health were alike unequal.

The most important work that Middleton published was Ancient Rome in 1885, originally based upon an article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, and finally expanded into two volumes in 1892. He also compiled a catalogue of the gems in the Fitzwilliam Museum (1891), and a handbook on illuminated MSS. in classical and medieval times (1892). The characteristic of all these books is the intimate acquaintance shown with technical processes. For, in truth, Middleton was not so much a scholar in the German sense, as a trained observer, with a keen and sympathetic eye, and an unusual power of lucid exposition. So far as we know, he never published his Cambridge lectures, nor those which he delivered on sculpture from time to time to the art students of the Royal Academy. But he wrote frequently on special subjects in Archæologia and the Journal of Hellenic Studies.

It remains to say that Middleton possessed, in the happier periods of his life, a genius for friendship. He would devote himself to the service of others—even when they had little claim on him—with an affection that was almost feminine. At the same time, he could burn with righteous anger against whatever was base in conduct or in art. His character, indeed, was half Italian, strengthened by the religion of Positivism, which—at one period, at least—exercised a powerful influence upon him.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. have in the press a new Life of Jean-François Millet, by Mrs. Henry Ady (Julia Cartwright). It will contain many letters from the pen of the great painter which were not published in Sensier's volume, together with much interesting information respecting his life and surroundings, the sale and subsequent history of his pictures, which has been supplied by his family and friends. The book will be illustrated with photogravures from the master's most famous works, including "Le Semeur," "Les Glaneuses" and "La Jeune Bergère," and several of the drawings in the collection of Mr. J. S. Forbes recently exhibited at the Grafton Gallery, which have never before been engraved. Among these will be a reproduction of the pastel of the "Angelus," which varies in several particulars from the picture now in M. Chauchard's possession.

MR. BATSFORD will shortly issue a facsimile reproduction of Heppelwhite's rare folio book of furniture designs, which appeared in 1789 under the title of The Cabinetmaker and Upholsterer's Guide. It contains 127 engraved plates, with nearly 300 designs for every article of household furniture.

THE July number of the Magazine of Art will contain a pictorial supplement devoted to the Paris Salons, reproducing some of the principal pictures shown at the Champ de Mars and the Champs-Élysées.

THERE will open next week, at the Clifford Galleries, Haymarket, an exhibition of pictures by Mrs. Louise Jopling and Mr. E. B. Havell.

WHAT is known as the Clifden Romney—containing portraits of Caroline Viscountess Clifden, and her sister, Lady Elizabeth Spencer, represented as Music and Painting—was sold last week for 10,500 guineas (Wertheimer). This is said to be the third highest price ever given for a picture in this country.

THE following were some of the principal prices realised at the sale of the late Sir Julian Goldamid's pictures, on Saturday last: By Reynolds—the Countess of Cork, 7500 guineas (Agnew); Mrs. Mathew, 4000 guineas (Tooth); the Countess of Coventry, 3800 guineas (Agnew); the fourth Duke of Rutland, 1400 guineas (Tooth); by Gainsborough—Lady Eden, 5000 guineas (Agnew); a Dehane family group, 2100 guineas (Tooth); a landscape near Bath, 3100 guineas (Vokins); by Romney—Mrs. James Oliver, 3100 guineas (Agnew); Miss Harriet Shore, 2750 guineas (Agnew); Lady Urith Shore, 2000 guineas (Tooth); and Lady Hamilton as Contemplation, 1210 guineas (Davis).

THE Prix de Paris, given annually at the Champs Élysées Salon, has been awarded to M. Paul Buffet, for his picture "Fête Antique." The three travelling bursaries have been awarded to M. Bonis, the painter of a frieze for the Paris Hôtel de Ville; M. Oh. Duvent, who exhibited this year the "Seigneur soit avec nous" and the "Marché aux Poissons à Audierne"; and M. Steck, for his "Tendre Automne."

MR. LIONEL WALDEN's picture of "Cardiff Docks," now on exhibition at the Salon, has been purchased by the French Government.

M. HOMOLLE, director of the French School at Athens, maintains his opinion that the bronze statue recently discovered in the course of the excavations at Delphi (of which mention was made in the ACADEMY of June 6) belongs to the inscribed base that was also found close by. He further believes that the inscription is of Syracusan origin, and that the name of the dedicator was probably Hieron.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT's short visit and the return of Mrs. Kendal are the London theatrical events of the last week or two. Mme. Bernhardt has shown nothing less than her customary power, but has been seen in hardly a new part. An article of some importance on the present performance of Mrs. Kendal in Mr. Grundy's "Greatest of These" would have been due to our readers, had not the ACADEMY printed, about last Christmas, Mr. Wedmore's article on the performance as he saw it at Brighton. In the interval the great English actress can scarcely have either improved or deteriorated; and there is everywhere abundant testimony to the excellence of her interpretation, and to the sufficiency of Mr. Kendal's art as "the pachydermatous husband." But surely the general cast is in one or two important particulars stronger than it was at Brighton or at Hull. Mr. Kemble—such a finished character actor—has accepted the part of the divine, and at least one other performer of note has joined the company for the time being. The effect produced by the piece and its performance could not fail to be great.

YET another change of bill is announced at the Lyceum, where a revival of "The School for Scandal" has, it appears, been taken in hand with some rapidity. Mrs. Patrick Campbell having been anything but "convincing" in "Magda." What she will be as Lady Teazle remains to be seen. Somebody must have great faith in her "drawing power" in whatever part she may decide to experiment with; but, clever enough though several of her performances have been, her quite distinct successes have been limited to one or two. And that this was likely to be so was prophesied by the knowing when she first surprised and interested people in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray."

MR. CHARLES WYNDHAM, who with long accumulated experience gets stronger and stronger and more admirable than ever in his art, proposes to perform Messrs. Louis Parker and Murray Carson's "Rosemary" at Berlin during the autumn. We do not for a moment doubt his success; and are glad that the Prussians will have an opportunity of seeing English dramatic art represented by a piece so healthy and entertaining—and withal so sympathetic—and by a performance so vigorous and accomplished.

WE understand that one of the principal features of the performance of Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus," by the Elizabethan Stage Society, will be the introduction of "The Seven Deadly Sins," the designs for which have been taken from engravings of the sixteenth century in the print room of the British Museum. The first and last parts of the play will reproduce in colour and costume the university life of Marlowe's day. The middle part of the play, the one most difficult for a stage manager to cope with, will consist of tableaux showing Faustus on his travels, giving living pictures of the Feast of St. Peter, introducing the picturesque incident of the curse with "bell, book and candle"; the banquet at the court of the Emperor Charles the Fifth; and the flight of Faustus, in his chariot drawn by yoked dragons, "to scale Olympus' top." Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch will supply the music."

MUSIC.

OPERA AT COVENT GARDEN.

"DIE WALKÜRE" was given on Saturday evening, and, for the first time, in French. It is, of course, best for an opera to be sung in the language for which the music was originally written; and especially is this the case with Wagner music-drama in which tone and word are so intimately connected. An ideal state of things will, however, not always obtain. In this particular case the artists, M. Alvarez and Mme. Lola Beeth, no doubt determined the choice of the French language. Mme. Beeth, who took the part of Sieglinde, has a good, if unequal, voice. She possesses true dramatic instinct, and gave a powerful impersonation of the unhappy heroine, though we do not think the rôle altogether suited to her. A slight tendency to overact may, perhaps, have been the result of nervousness. The lady is handsome, and, even apart from her great merits, this would prove an attraction. One feature in her singing deserves special mention: namely, the clearness of her enunciation; not a word was lost. M. Alvarez gave a fine presentation of Siegmund, and his singing was admirable. Mme. Mantelli, as Brünnhilde, was at her best. M. Albers proved rather a tame Wotan. Signor Mancinelli conducted with great care and ability.

RECENT CONCERTS, ETC.

HERR MOTTL gave his third and last concert at Queen's Hall on June 11. It was entitled a "Wagner Festival Concert": there were the "Sohmiedelieder" and the closing scene from "Siegfried," also the Prologue and closing scene from "Die Götterdämmerung." These excerpts must have proved welcome to those of the audience who intend to go to Bayreuth this summer for the performances of the "Ring des Nibelungen." We have often insisted on the fact that Wagner's music-dramas will not bear transplantation from the stage to the concert platform without serious loss; but in this particular case the end probably justified the means. Of the vocalists, Frau Ida Doxat and Herren E. Gerhäuser and Bussart, the lady was the best: her declamatory singing in the "Götterdämmerung" scene was admirable. The "Norns" scene, too, with Frau Mottl, Fr. Gelber, and Mme. A. Janson, deserves high praise. The orchestra, under Herr Mottl's able direction, played well; and the concert proved, on the whole, a great success.

Señor Sarasate gave his second concert at St. James's Hall, on Saturday last. Again a Bach Sonata, in A, headed the programme; and although we do not think the severe music of North Germany altogether suits the impulsive Spaniard, still he deserves all praise for introducing chamber music which has been unduly neglected, and, therefore, not properly appreciated. This Sonata was followed by Goldmark's First Suite in A (Op. 11), for violin and pianoforte, an interesting, though scarcely inspired work: it was admirably interpreted by Señor Sarasate and Dr. Otto Neitzel. The latter performed as solo the greater part of Schumann's "Carneval." In his reading of the music he displayed character and intelligence, and at the close was summoned to the platform. The violinist gave some of his show pieces, and his wonderful playing created immense enthusiasm. It was unfortunate that the first two Sarasate concerts clashed with the last two given by M. Ysaye at the Queen's Hall. The programmes were highly interesting, and the Belgian artist appears to have obtained a thoroughly well-deserved successes.

The "Kneisel" Quartet from Boston commenced a series of three chamber concerts at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon. A certain suspicion attaches to anything announced as "celebrated"; but the four artists, MM. Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski, and Alwin Schroeder, may justly lay claim to that title. For many years they have devoted themselves to the study of chamber music, and by constant practice together have arrived at an ensemble quite remarkable. We may have greater players at the Monday Popular Concerts, but, except on rare occasions, they cannot compare with these quatuor juncti in uno. This excellent quality, however, would not suffice to explain the genuine success obtained by the Boston musicians. They play, in addition, with marked intelligence, refinement, and feeling; and it was a real treat to listen to them. Their first programme, including a Quartet by Sgambati, Beethoven's early one in G (Op. 18, No. 2), and Schumann's in A (Op. 41, No. 3), was not altogether satisfactory. They announce, for one of the remaining concerts, Beethoven's great Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 131); and it was, therefore, unnecessary to waste their skill on a work by the same master which by comparison is indeed small. The six Quartets of Op. 18 are interesting in their way, but on a special occasion, such as the present one, scarcely in place. Then, again, to listen to three Quartets in immediate succession is somewhat of a strain; a song, or even a short pianoforte solo between, would surely be welcome. We offer this hint for the sake of the artists themselves; the better the playing, the greater the need of some contrast.

M. Louis Pecsai, a new violinist, played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto at the last Philharmonic Concert on Wednesday evening. He is young, and has a certain skill in execution; but his rendering of the music was in more ways than one unsatisfactory. It lacked soul, and the Andante was as much too slow as the Finale was too fast. Then, again, the violinist continually ran one phrase into the other, so that the meaning of the musical sentences was spoilt. One must allow probably for nervousness; anyhow, the début of M. Pecsai at the Philharmonic was scarcely a success. M. A. Reisenhauer performed Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor: some of his playing was brilliant, but some jerky; moreover, his conception of the music was too modern. Mme. Camilla Landi, although not in very good voice, gave an excellent rendering of Berlioz's poetical and picturesque setting of Victor Hugo's "La Captive." The programme commenced with Mr. MacCunn's "Ship o' the Fiend" Overture, and concluded with Schubert's great Symphony in C, almost a concert in itself. Why does the Philharmonic have such long programmes? and why does it allow pianists to play encores, and very long ones? and, once more, could it not make its programmes a little more progressive? The Philharmonic Society, with its fine orchestra and intelligent conductor, ought to achieve better results than it has done this season.

JARROLD &amp; SONS' NEW NOVELS

DAFFODIL LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS,
BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY.

12mo, cloth gilt, 2s. each; Paper covers, 1s. 6d. each.

Vol. I.—GRANT ALLEN'S
SENSATIONAL STORY,
THE JAWS OF DEATH."The whole thing is exceedingly well done; we recommend the first volume of the 'Daffodil Library.'—Daily News."The Jaws of Death" is a pretty piece of writing in the sensational line. It is cleverly told somewhat on the lines laid down by Poe when he undertook to show how to write a Black wood tale. We are brought so smoothly, so gradually, to the very edge of the catastrophe the shiver of it is upon us almost before we are there. It is extremely creditable to Mr. Allen's invention."—Daily Chronicle."We have greater novelists than Mr. Allen, but none who better understands the weaving of plot and the invaluable art of sustaining interest. 'The Jaws of Death' is a highly characteristic piece of work, and will afford as fascinating a half-hour's reading as any one is likely to get this season."—Publishers' Circular.

Vol. II.—READY IN A FEW DAYS.

5,000 Copies of the Second Volume, entitled SAPPHIRA OF THE STAGE.

By GEORGE KNIGHT,

Author of "Dust in the Balance,"

And late Editor of "The Liverpool Porcupine."

NOW READY, FIRST VOLUME IN

THE "IMPRESSIONIST" SERIES,

BY A NEW AUTHOR, entitled

DUST IN THE BALANCE.

By GEORGE KNIGHT.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

With Title-page and cover design by Laurence Housman.

"The style is smooth and smooth; the sentiment human and genuine; and altogether this is in its kind one of the best sets of short sketches that have recently been published."—Scottsman.
"Mr. Knight has published a varied series of studies, each of which is marked by strong individuality and great charm."—Star.

London: JARROLD &amp; SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.; and of all Booksellers.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN

Mos BAKER, crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES,
AND OTHER SERMONS."Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 5s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times."Masterly, beautiful, inspiring."—Methodist Recorder.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"The work of a master of pulpit oratory."—Freeman.

THE HOLY OF HOLIES: a Series of Sermons

on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"Every sermon glows with unction, and shows intense power."—Methodist Recorder.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, and the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"For more than a quarter of a century he has held almost an unchallenged position as the prince of pulpit orators. The back pews of Dr. Maclaren's church are in the nooks and corners of the earth."—Methodist Times.LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, 21 AND 22, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

Large crown 8vo, nearly 800 pages, cloth, 6s., post free.

THE GUARDIAN.—"It is certainly a convenience to have the history of Dissent in England presented in a connected form, and from a Dissenter's point of view. And for these purposes we can recommend this, which gives the history in a handy and convenient form."

TIMES.—"As a complete exposition of the history of Dissent, from the Nonconformist point of view, it is no doubt certain to retain its reputation."

LONDON: ALEXANDER &amp; SHEPHEARD, PUBLISHERS, 21 AND 22, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

LITERATURE.

Weir of Hermiston. An Unfinished Romance.
By R. L. Stevenson. (Ohatto & Windus.)

Those who have studied the play of literary reaction are listening with foreboding, though without surprise, to the chorus of adulation which has greeted Stevenson's last fragment. It is the last, and it is a fragment. The last-born—the little Benjamin, dearest to a father's eye, regarded with most favour by friends and family—with compunction we read into it all the concentrated merits of its predecessors which perchance we had undervalued. And a fragment, too: what scope that affords for panegyric of an unwritten masterpiece! I can remember quite distinctly the blank looks and secret grumbling of staunch admirers as Edwin Drood and Denis Duval were sapping their faith: the sense of relief, mingled with remorse, when the tension was snapped; the revulsion of feeling which inspired the comfortable doctrine that a feeble opening was only a foil to the problematical splendour of the later pages that would have been.

Further, the fame of Dickens and Thackeray lacked the support of the grandest advertising agency the world has yet seen. Caledonia, stern and wild enough upon occasions to little sinners like Keats and Byron, has ever been to each poetic child of her own not only a fit nurse, but a most partial, indulgent, and boastful one. Stevenson began auspiciously by being born a Scot. True, he rather derogated at first by canoeing and donkey-driving in stupid foreign lands, apparently destitute of "gowans" and "rowans," and by writing essays and wonder-stories in strictly English English. Then came his first Scotch tale: a glorious cake, well stuffed with plums—delicious dialect words, and lots of lovely Scotch names of places. Names, names, names—why, the first column of a North British Railway Guide is divine music to the Caledonian exile's ear. For the exile is the real fugleman. I hear that in Edinburgh they affect genteel indifference to "braes" and "cuddies" and "puddocks": nay, I suspect that they secretly prefer to see their books spiced with scraps of French and Italian. But I know as a fact that when the Scotch critic in London or Oxford, on glancing down a first-cut page, lights on one or two such Masonic passwords as "brig," "burn," "howe," or "toon," all that is "stern and wild" in him melts at once into a dulcet receptivity. And should he see in print but one cherished topographical name—the Brig o' Guddlepudddock or the Kirk o' Cuddyclavers—he feels that he has discovered another master-mind. Is this an abuse? No: merely a picturesque and healthy Celtic survival. But, all the same, nostalgia is not criticism.

Now there is the grossest assurance, effrontery, downright impudence in the Scotch argument that you and I cannot appreciate or criticise Scotch genius because we do not exactly know what "puddocks" are, and have never gone there to identify them. Remoteness of time and place, difference of language, strangeness of environment are allowed to be no bar to our grappling with Hesiod, or Hafiz, or Dante, or Tourgenieff; but the divine Ploughman! and the inimitable Shepherd! and the wizardly Sir Walter!—impossible! All this is just disgusting conceit veiled under flimsy mysticism. Waverley is just as easy to criticise as Père Goriot, Kidnapped as Treasure Island; for true criticism is cosmopolitan. Celtic criticism, because it is so true, is peculiarly cosmopolitan; but with one serious limitation, namely, national vanity. Irish estimates of Irish literature have long been a pitiful scandal. The Frenchman—or at least the French exile—in the presence of his grands écrivains drops the critic, and becomes the voluble showman. As for the Scotch critic, owing to his national vanity—or call it racial pride, or tribal loyalty, or patriotism, if he like that better—the one subject with which he is hopelessly incompetent to deal fairly is Scotland, the very subject from which he would warn off foreign critics. Yet each year he imports over the Border a new genius or a new masterpiece, and bids us worship. What? Not so much the general merit, which, we admit, is always considerable. No, his real grounds are, first, the subject—strictly Scotch. Next, the scenery and topography (including all the names)—so correctly Scotch. Surely this is no great feat for a native. Besides, the general impression created by these hysterical descriptions is of a Scotland so cold, windy, grey, so meanly theatrical and so pretentiously commonplace, that I have never dared to face it, though hospitable friends assure me—nor do I doubt them—that I should find it quite different from the literary pictures which a minute before they have been corroborating. And as to the names, they are not lovely in themselves, and to the Parisian or Oxonian Caud-stanealap evokes no more boyhood memories than Camberwell.

Next, we are to marvel at the characters and manners—so inimitably (that is the orthodox adverb) Scotch. Well, what wonder if a sharp provincial knows his monde de province? Granted that Scotch life is interesting, mainly owing to its survivals of barbarism, Russian is equally so. Granted that some manly virtues and some domestic graces have found in Scotland their most congenial home, still the whole impression is not alluring or even satisfying to the foreigner. The reason is obvious, though carefully ignored. The picture of Scotch life given by their best modern novelists is entirely false, because it is incomplete. I know personally nothing of the Scot at home, nor am I aware how far a surreptitious or provincial literature has lifted the veil. But the barest knowledge of human nature and human history is enough to show that it is a veil, and that it betrays awkward rents even when spread by the most prudish of writers. For, depend upon it, wherever there is organised Puritanism there is organised hypocrisy—among the followers of Knox, just as among the Wahabis of Arabia. And that very Puritanism gagged the lips of the authors who could and would speak out. Scott, like Dickens, elected to write novels for family use; discreet reticence has been to others the orthodox path to fame. Burns often, with wine-born veracity, betrayed the cause; but, then, he was only a glorious Helot. In others the secret just peeps out here and here: for instance, in that invariable snigger over the "stool of repentance," which alone proves that the Scriptural conscience of the Scot allowed a time for stern moralising and a time for loose jesting, a time for purity and a time for impurity. Such, indeed, I suspect, was his usual ethical standpoint. Further, wherever there is drink—and Scotland once swam, and in places still wades, in it—there will be vice and vile conversation. I do not believe that the talk that went on in a Scotch pothouse was a tessellation of pious ejaculations, quaint proverbs, and shrewd epigrams, or that it was much purer than that of an English hayfield or gin palace—corrupt, indeed, compared to an old-fashioned Kerry shebeen. Under all this ugly pietism—or call it ignorant arrogance if you want two names for one thing—under the whited sepulchre of Puritan morals, under the breezy, affected bonhomie of speech and tone, there must have lain a seething, dammed-up torrent of coarse passions and mean, crafty spites, guarded by each man as his own soul's secret from his prying neighbours; and further, a limited but strictly organised practice of vice, laxity, and backsliding, perfectly recognised and tolerated, but rigorously ignored by an official conspiracy of silence. Had a Zola arisen instead of a Scott—absit omen!—I fear his pictures would have been not much prettier than those in La Terre. Doubtless a similar charge has been brought against the more reticent of English novelists; but they seem to suppress and ignore simply to spare the reader's blushes and their own reputations for delicacy. In them we detect no tacit pact to refrain from touching the rotten old arks, and from exposing the frailties of national life and character. But times are changing. Our Stevenson, Scotch as he was in the best sense—nor would we have him otherwise—was English too; nay, French; nay, cosmopolitan. Probably he would have minimised to the last the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere in which he had been reared. We all do. Her native Gutter-lane is a salubrious legend of my old housekeeper. I once landed at Oberbourg with an English lady of the healthy wild-rose type; and as we met the ancient stenches of the first street, she sniffed the gale with holiday rapture, and owned that "her spirits always rose when she recognised the dear old smells": she had been educated in a French convent. Had Carlyle or Ruakin been born and bred in Fonthill Abbey, I doubt if they would have thought it such a very flagrant sham; they might, however, have admitted a little judicious alteration. Stevenson had gone far—as far or farther than Young Scotland. With his consummate art he contrives to hint the most while offending the least. In the fifth chapter there is a sort of detached essay or character-study, called "A Border Family," of extraordinary power and insight. It illustrates much that has here been suggested. The cordial relations, the tacit understanding between these four brothers—the respectable farmer, the fanatic saint, the worldly merchant, and the sinful poet—seem to me a type of the real Scotland as it must have been.

Yet one more canon of the nostalgia criticism and the last. We are to know the masterpieces by their dialect—it is so faultlessly Scotch. Well, no doubt it affords to the exile a genuine and innocent pleasure, but to us it is no sweeter than the Dorset tongue. And it is time we refused to be hectorred into confusing it with genius. Inspiration is not required for writing Scotch. You have only to be born a peasant, or be allowed to mix with the servants, or in later life carry a note-book, in order to write, if not speak, any dialect. And the oddest thing is that the critics cannot agree over the norma loquendi; what one approves, another denounces: indeed, one Scottish lady, a perfect ultramontane, assures me that they are every one all utterly wrong—except, of course, Sir Walter.

I have said little about the book itself. I never meant to. A minute criticism of the few first chapters of an unfinished work would be both futile and unfair. Far more to the purpose is it to protest against the extravagance which has proclaimed these chapters as Stevenson's masterpiece, and to point out the reason why. It is this. All the leading reviewers who have started this exaggeration—the smaller men merely follow their lead—are probably Scotch by birth or sympathy. Their patriotism and nostalgia is fired to frenzy by the thought that their country employed Stevenson's last thoughts; and, as Mr. Colvin concludes, "surely no son of Scotland has died leaving with his last breath a worthier tribute to the land he loved." That is all: compliment to be paid back with interest.

Weir of Hermiston, so far as it went—and like Mr. Colvin I shrink from divining the sequel—is not superior, not even equal, to the author's best work. Of course, every year he gained more facility, more concentration, more experience. But his inherent deficiencies he never made up. And here, even in the first chapters—the later ones in places seem disjointed and unrevised, and, I infer, had not been printed—there is unusual abruptness and want of unity. In fact, they seem rather to promise a series of powerful character-sketches, strung together by a thin, conventional, tragic story. But powerful they are, many of them. By far the finest is that of the weak, devoted wife. Next the Four Brothers. The "Hanging Judge" is excellently interpreted; but, after all, given Braxfield as a model and the "elder Brutus tragedy" as a motif, the treatment was obvious and inevitable. And had Stevenson thought of him, there was another judge of that period of whom he could have made more. The elder Kirstie is a fine creation, but there is something morbid which jars a little in the powerful chamber scene. Some, it seems, think the niece a failure; her airs and graces, of course, appear to us just old fashioned enough to be vulgarly genteel, but I must think her a very living being. The hero, so far, is an anachronism for the assumed date, 1814. If the Four Brothers and old Hermiston are put forty years too late, young Weir is equally too early. He is clearly painted partly from Stevenson's student-self, partly from some college friend; and so far he has not impressed us. One of the best critics, when old Weir says a remark is "merely literary and decorative," defies us to find another modernism. They abound in thought and phrase.

Rich as it is in those perfections of which Stevenson was a supreme master, Weir of Hermiston would never have been a great novel, for a great novel he could never have written. Many years ago I pointed that out in these columns, and hinted at the reason. A stranger, he wrote to tell me that I had divined his secret. We discussed at some length this and kindred matters. He knew, he owned, success was impossible, but he must go on trying. In the only letter I have preserved I find one sentence which to those who have deeply studied him means everything; to others it is but a phrase. "Ethics," he wrote, "have ever been my veiled mistress." He could see that without a firm, strong, undoubting (albeit, ignorant or insolent), moral standpoint, no great, grasping novel could be achieved. What he would not see was that great literature is not all great novels; that though the stately galleon, with its noble lines and steady stride, is indeed admirable, the graceful shallop, the saucy frigate, and the storm-loving Greenlander are equally in their way masterpieces. To the end he fought against conviction—"Mind you," he says, "I expect my Justice Clerk to be my masterpiece." Yet, I doubt if he was ever deceived as to the result. The great novel never emerged, but in its stead what a roll of successes, and in such various styles! Why complain? Great novelists we have had, but only one man who could give us the Isle of Voices, of all his gems the fairest, rarest, most imperishable. His fame must not be hurt by hysterical patriots; some one should protest, and distasteful as it is, I claim to do so, and for this reason. When I had reviewed Virginibus Puerisque in the ACADEMY, Mark Pattison, who had reviewed it, I think, in the Athenaeum, as we talked it over, approved my youthful enthusiasm, and surprised me by the immense importance he attached to the book and the new author. My faith in Stevenson was primitive, was spontaneous, and has never wavered. Not all his present idolators can say as much.

E. PURCELL.

TWO BOOKS ON SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

Methods of Social Reform: Essays Critical and Constructive. By Thomas Mackay. (John Murray.)

Strikes and Social Problems. By J. Shield Nicholson, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. (A. & O. Black.)

THESE two studies of the social problem may be said to be both written from the same general point of view; the standpoint of each, if we may be permitted to use a generally accepted term, to which Mr. Mackay takes some exception, being decidedly individualistic. Both, nevertheless, afford, by their very spirit of antagonism, a striking testimony to the increasing diffusion of Socialistic ideas in this country within recent years. As Prof. Nicholson says, "the air is teeming with all kinds of Socialistic theories"; and Mr. Mackay goes still further in deploring the general lapse from sound economic doctrine. Both political parties are in his view almost equally guilty on this head.

"The country has lately gone through the throes of a general election, and a party has been returned to power pledged to devote itself to what it vaguely terms social reform. This verdict of the constituencies has been interpreted as marking the intensity of the national wish to legislate about our social arrangements. Elsewhere, and probably more truly, the result of the late election has been imputed to popular disgust with a Government whose social legislation, dictated by the noisiest, most mischievous, and at the same time least influential of its supporters, has harassed and alarmed every respectable section of the community. There is some truth in both representations. The victory of the Conservative party has been gained, on the one hand, by promises of a wild and impracticable policy of State socialism, and, on the other hand, by the vote of those who support a party which, as they think, cannot, fortunately for the welfare of the country, do much to redeem these pledges."

The anti-Socialist polemics with which Mr. Mackay opens and concludes his book have, however, no necessary bearing on the essays on Poor Law Administration, which compose its central part. His conclusions on these practical subjects may in the main be accepted by those who differ most widely from his theoretical views. As he admits,

"it is not necessary to discuss proposals for using the poor law as a means of bringing about equality of fortune and condition among all classes of the community. For though it is a part of the Socialist programme to use taxation as a means of abolishing 'capitalism' and for handing over the wealth of the country to some form of collective tenure, it is not proposed, as I understand it, to use the poor law for this purpose. . . . The quarrel of the Socialist is not specially with the poor law, but with the present mechanism of society, which, in his opinion, makes a poor law necessary."

The main point of our author's contention is a by no means unfamiliar one, but a point, in his opinion, which specially needs to be emphasised at present—the restriction of out-door relief within as narrow limits as possible and the rigid application of the workhouse test. He considers that the present administration of the poor law in many districts acts as an obstacle to thrift among the working classes, and shows a tendency to revert to the abuses of the old system which prevailed previous to 1834:

"We must have our poor law—it is an inevitable evil—but to justify its existence, it must perpetually be making war on the irresponsibility, which is the main cause of pauperism; it must, in fact, be so administered that it tends to throw the people more and more on their own resources, to diminish and not increase the number of those permanently dependent."

Prof. Nicholson's book is even more largely occupied with matters of anti-Socialist controversy than Mr. Mackay's, but his tone of denunciation is not quite so bitter as that displayed by the latter writer in some passages. He makes, however, no pretensions to give an impartial estimate of the strength and weakness of modern Socialism, such as has been attempted by his American congener Prof. Ely, in the extremely fair and valuable treatise which he has lately published. The English professor writes distinctly as an advocate of free competition and "industrial liberty"; and no doubt he is an acute and able advocate who can readily seize on the weak points in his adversaries' case, though many would contend that he fails to realise the true grounds of the dissatisfaction so widely felt with the present social system.

In some cases the assumptions which form the bases of his arguments would not pass altogether unquestioned. For instance, he says: "It is admitted on all sides—even by Socialists—that, so far as production is concerned, the system of free competition is most effective." But this is exactly what is not admitted by all, probably not by the majority of Socialists. To take one example, Mr. Bellamy, in his well-known romance, has assailed the competitive system on this very ground of its deficiencies as a productive agency, and contends that the state of industrial warfare which it necessitates inevitably causes a vast amount of waste and destruction of wealth.

Prof. Nicholson is confident "that the verdict of history, speaking broadly, is that governmental regulation of industry has been for the most part either useless or mischievous." Socialists would admit that this statement contains a considerable amount of truth; but they would contend that the evil effects of the past legislation of oligarchical governments on behalf of monopolies and class interests should not be allowed to prejudice the cause of modern social democracy, which aims at the good of the whole community. Our author himself does not maintain that the interference of the State in industrial matters has been always pernicious; but he informs us "that those laws which it has been found desirable to continue and extend, and which seem to control the freedom of individuals and classes, are, in reality, for the most part designed, by restraining to some extent the freedom of a small minority, to extend the freedom of very large majorities."

Many Socialists would say that in these words their whole case is admitted in principle, and that their only quarrel with the Professor is as to the extent of its application. This passage, in fact, is hardly consistent with what Prof. Nicholson says elsewhere, where he seems almost to take up the extreme individualist position of Mr. Auberon Herbert:

"It is no avail to assent to the praise of liberty, and at the same time to assert that this assent is purely an abstract pious opinion, and that every case must be weighed on its merits according simply to the benefits expected. If liberty is still to be a power for good, it must be cherished for its own sake, and every free man must take care that he does nothing that may even seem like a sacrifice of independence."

It is certainly somewhat difficult exactly to reconcile the views expressed in the last two quotations.

Prof. Nicholson is thoroughly convinced that, as an historical fact,

"for centuries the progress of the nation has been real and continuous. In a few particulars—in themselves no more than sufficient to emphasise the general rule—there have been exceptions, that is to say, development in one direction appears to have involved degradation in another. But on the whole, so far as the productive power of the nation is concerned, every generation has not only inherited the powers of its predecessors, but has done something to increase that power."

This statement is no doubt quite literally correct; but if it is intended to imply that the condition of the masses of the people has been always steadily improving, many facts might be adduced on the contrary side. The exhaustive investigations of the late Prof. Thorold Rogers surely prove that progress in this direction has been by no means uniform. It is obvious, for instance, that the position of the working classes as a whole was distinctly worse in the sixteenth century than in the fifteenth, or in the last half of the eighteenth century as compared with the first half. And when our author quite justifiably points to the immense advance in the well-being of the majority of the nation which has marked the present century, it might, with some justice, be urged that the reason why this seems so great in the retrospect is partly because the condition of large masses of the people at the commencement of the epoch was about as miserable as it had ever been, as far back as records afford us trustworthy information.

In comparing the present with the past, Prof. Nicholson makes very positively one assertion which is certainly open to question:

"The villain of the middle ages does not correspond to the lowest agricultural labourer of modern times; on the contrary, to make the comparison at all just, the villain should be compared with the substantial tenant-farmer; and if we seek for the proper medieval type of our lowest agricultural labourer, he will be found in the slave pure and simple—the chattel which could be bought and sold."

This statement opens out a very wide field for discussion, which includes some extremely obscure points of social history, such as the gradual extinction of personal slavery in England after the Norman Conquest, and the exact meaning of the distinction between the villain in gross and the villain regardant. It seems evident, however, that actual chattel slavery, as distinguished from serfdom, did not exist to any wide extent in the periods from which those whose views our author criticises would draw their instances of medieval villinage: that is, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries.

R. SKYMOUR LONG.

Shakespeare and Music. By Edward W. Naylor, Mus.Bac. (Dent.)

WE are all aware of the debt we owe to the poet who turns our eyes to the light, and enables us to see what we have long been looking at or to understand what we have long been thinking about. We are not so ready to recognise the necessity of some correspondence between the reader and the writer of the hand-book or primer, if any educational result is to follow. But the writer of a primer does us no good and gives us no pleasure, unless he arranges our knowledge for us, and not merely his own. The primer is an instrument of torture and a poisoner of the mental activities, unless we have in our minds so much knowledge of its subject-matter that the arrangement of it is a reasonable and comfortable process for us.

It is, therefore, because Mr. Naylor's book "contains little that is not tolerably well known, both to Shakespeare scholars and musicians," that it will be read with pleasure by all intelligent persons. Every now and then we light upon a book which saves us the trouble of making one, and is, moreover, much neater and prettier and more complete than the home-made article could ever have been. Mr. Naylor's manual is just such a book. Why has no competent person written it sooner? Quite obviously the subject requires a monograph. The songs, the dances, the musical terms, and the musical instruments of Shakespeare's age have become either obsolete or different. Music, moreover, in Elizabethan times was comparatively more important as an instrument of culture and delight, and more universally practised and enjoyed, than it is nowadays. There may have been fewer professionals because the art was less technical, but amateurs were everywhere—in the palace and in the alehouse.

"Yet do we daily observe," says Campion, "that when any shall sing a Treble to an instrument the standers-by will be offering at an inward part out of their own nature; and true or false out it must."

And, again, Shakespeare's relation to the music of his day needs explanation. The cathedrals and chapels were the schools which trained the noted musicians of the day, who did not therefore come very quickly into contact with the theatres. Scarcely any of Shakespeare's songs were adequately set to music by noted composers, although his finest lyrics reflect exquisitely the delicate refinement and grace of the English music of his time.

But Mr. Naylor explains all this in his pleasant book, which has such a delightful old-world flavour about it. He is wise enough to give his information, so far as he can, in contemporary language; and makes large use of Thomas Morley's "Plain and Easy Introduction to practical Music, set downe in forme of a dialogue" (1597). We could have borne with even more than Mr. Naylor gives us, so admirable is Morley's style. Just because the word "madrigal" does not occur in Shakspeare, Mr. Naylor ought to have quoted Morley's remarks on this most characteristic Elizabethan musical composition. And he might have illustrated the catholicity of the Elizabethan musician's taste by his quaint conclusion—"and I dare boldly affirm that look who so he be who thinketh himself the best descant of all his neighbours, enjoyn him to make but a Scottish jig; he will grossly err in the true nature and quality of it." Mr. Naylor, however, has to find room for quotations about dances from Arbeau's Orchésographie, which is a French book published in 1588 of quite absorbing interest. But ought Mr. Naylor, even for Arbeau, to refrain from quoting the locus classicus on the galliard and the pavan?

"For that brave sunne, the father of the daye,
Doth love this earth, the mother of the night,
And like a reveller in rich array
Doth dance his galliard in his leman's sight,
Both back and forth and sideways passing light.

"Who doth not see the measures of the moon,
Which thirteene times she dancoth every year,
And ends her pavin thirteene times as soon
As doth her brother."

How is it that we have no cheap and handy edition of Sir John Davies's poetry?

It is no small part of the pleasure such a manual as this gives a reader to note where his own individual taste or reading would have varied either the arrangement or the illustrations of a chapter. Mr. Naylor's pages on stage directions, we think, might be curtailed, and his remarks on Pythagoreanism lengthened. He discusses Shakspeare's most interesting use of the music of hautboys under the stage (Ant. and Cleop. iv. 3, 12) to mark the point when "the god Hercules, whom Antony loves, now leaves him"; but he does not consider the use of music in the "Tempest" to cast Miranda into a sort of sleepy trance, and its kindred use in the Shakspearean portion of "Pericles." Such passages indicate an excessive physical sensibility to music on Shakspeare's part. A noticeable excellence in Mr. Naylor's volume is his care in marking the exact technical force of such terms as "music," "measure," "noise," "touch," "strain," "division," "fret," "dump," "concord," "descant," "mean," "ground," "burden." We miss the finer shades of meaning in many beautiful passages, unless we know accurately what these terms meant.

Mr. Naylor is admirable on musical instruments. We learn what a "chest" of viols was, and a "lusty full-sized theorbo," and a "soft recorder," and a "pair" of virginals, and a lute, and why the fife should be called "wry necked." We feel the charm of the scholar and the enthusiast in Mr. Naylor's loving minuteness and severe lucidity on all these matters. He actually condescends to ask us, "why woollen bagpipe?" Does he reject the plausible explanation, that the bag was usually covered with woollen or velvet?

But we must restrain our inclination to indiscriminate comment. Mr. Naylor has written a little manual which all readers of Shakspeare will heartily appreciate. It is the first of a series of "Temple Shakspeare Manuals," and is printed in such style as to worthily accompany the beautiful "Temple Shakspeare." The series could not well have commenced more auspiciously.

RONALD BAYNE.

Essays Fin de Siècle. By an (Anglo-Indian) Optimist. (Pioneer Press: Allahabad.)

WITH one grain of humour, these Essays might have brought to mind the melancholy Jaques, and "Mottey's the only wear," so quaintly do they moralise on the times. But, dry as the plains they hail from, they only emphasise the writer's own conviction that the Anglo-Indian is invariably a bore. Unassuming as they look, they range from the first principles of administration to the New Renaissance, and from the aggressive Anglo-Saxon to Woman, Politics, and Religion; but their Renaissance is still-born, and only the hill-tops can breathe life into the British barbarian and the fin de siècle woman of the plains. After all, "the liver is the shop of humours"; and it is something to find even the sky-sign of an Optimist at Allahabad.

On hobbies he is, of course, at home; his "hobby rider carries his own world with him," and he bursts into a beatitude on fads. He gets bilious as he thinks of the girl of the nineteenth century: laments that in gaining her liberty she has lost her bloom, and warns her solemnly against the sin of "cheapening Paradise." At the same time he fetters her a "flirtation chair," and considerably relieves her of her chaperon by securing that lady for himself. For her, indeed, he shows a touching tenderness; knows her to be more entertaining than her charge in "a solitude d-deux"; and suggests that "she might be posted—in any numbers—under the shade of a big tree, where she can see, but not hear or be obtrusively seen." We are shocked to discover an Allahabad "chaperone" flirting with the printer's devil "subtegmini fagi," and can only hope that merited correction awaits the erring pair.

To the Optimist "the ideal is the real"; "principle and expediency are identical"; and "purity of mind lies in the cultivation of the beautiful." There is truth beneath his paradox. He is right, too, in declaring that we Anglo-Saxons are at once aggressive and parochial. For the moment, "Little England" has been delegated to her own parish; jingoism is rampant; and with grim humour we are pretending to enjoy the efforts of our neighbours to make us see ourselves as others see us. We may laugh over our lesson, but we have much to learn.

In urging an educational franchise, the essayist has high authorities upon his side. In his essay on Religion we are informed that "subjective materialism leads man to disbelieve in goodness . . . and is an injury to progress," and that "objective faith has given rise to more harm in the world than anything else." We are further significantly told that during the World's Fair at Chicago, when the representatives of nearly every creed were kneeling together and repeating the Lord's Prayer, the Anglican Church and the Mohammedan High Priest joined hands in refusing permission to their representatives to attend the Congress. Tantaens animis coelestibus iras?

On descending from the clouds the Optimist alights on Indian ground, and here he ought to know what he is talking about. His words will come home to more than one old Indian as dealing honestly and soberly with grave problems of Indian life. But sensible and suggestive as he often is, it is, perhaps, on Indian topics that he will be relished least. He does not go far enough for the reformer; to the autocrat he will seem to go too far; both autocrat and reformer will treat him with disdain. And yet he feels his way to homely truths, and points to paths it would be well to follow. He righteously denounces "the devil's policy of playing off one section of the community against the other, so as to weaken and discredit both." He would foster rather than laugh down the principle of nationality; and he sees that "it cannot be right to let the martial instincts of any race die out." He recognises "the necessity of a healthy public opinion in India," and does justice to the wisdom of ungagging her Press. When we gave Milton as a school book, it was, indeed, time to learn that truth "needs no policies, no stratagema, no licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and defences that error uses against her power." Our death-warrant will have been signed in India when we no longer dare to allow her a free Press. It surely is no optimistic fad to look kindly on the aspirations of "Young India," and on the Congress that sets them forth? We may succeed in stifling life; but on success must come the question: "Who will deliver me from the body of this death?"

Nor should it be mere optimism to hope that a wider field may be found for our young Indian aristocracy. We have yet to realise the difference between an Alikanoff across our border and a Subhadar Bahadur Amir Ali Khan within it. Is it beyond the limits of a reasonable hope that well-born youths, into whom we have been striving to instil an English education and free Western thought, may yet be relieved from the humiliation of feeling themselves shut out from the commissioned grades of our army, and from the ranks of our volunteers?

On one subject at least the Anglo-Indian optimist talks downright rubbish. He bids us "look at the whole structure of evils . . . arising out of the Hindu joint-family system," and asks us to believe that "nearly all the benefits which were anticipated from the Permanent Settlement in Bengal have been marred by . . . the absence of primogeniture, and the operation of the undivided family." If the Permanent Settlement had depended for success on the breaking up of the Hindu family, it was from the first foredoomed. In religiously maintaining his sacred ties of family the Hindu has won the respect of all thinking men, and has set an example to the world; he has needed no poor law; and, in basing his system on the family, has recognised—what we are losing sight of—that the family is the real foundation of the state. In the East progress cannot but be slow; the sap of life must rise within. The great Service on the spot knows best the wants of India, and also knows how to meet them as they rise. Of all mischiefs, that of the officious meddler is the worst. The born ruler needs no fin de siècle sermons; but, in spite of boredom, he will be among the first to recognise the worth that underlies this unpretending little book.

NEW NOVELS.

A Fatal Past. By Dora Russell. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

Gifts and Weirds. By Lily Perks. (Bentley.)

The Robe of Lucifer. By F. M. White. (Innes.)

Hathersage. By Charles Edmund Hall. (Horace Cox.)

Harlow's Ideal. By Mrs. Forrester. (Hurst & Blackett.)

An Outcast of the Islands. By Joseph Conrad. (Fisher Unwin.)

The New Virtue. By Mrs. Oscar Beringer. (Heinemann.)

Black Spirits and White. By Ralph Adams Oram. (Chatto & Windus.)

I Loved Her Once. By John Strange Winter. (White.)

MISS DORA RUSSELL's story has enough substance to supply material for more than one Adelphi drama. Its interest for the ordinary novel reader may be safely assumed, and it would be quite unfair to deny to it a considerable measure of cleverness. Lady Ennismore had contracted a secret marriage with George Roche—an attractive man, but scarcely desirable as a husband—before she allied herself with Lord Ennismore. She thinks Roche dead; but he has escaped from a shipwreck, and in due, or rather undue, season presents himself. There was a son by this first union, Francis Roche. Lady Ennismore inherits a large property, with which she hopes to enrich her children by Lord Ennismore; but the reappearance of George Roche upsets her calculations. She has quite survived her youthful infatuation, and is devoted to the kindly old nobleman who believes himself her husband. The plot is further complicated in that Helen Drummond, to whom Francis Roche is attached, is the illegitimate daughter of Lady Ennismore's brother. This fact makes the unhappy lady's difficulties the greater. She attempts to extricate herself by a desperate expedient, thereby unwittingly sacrificing Lord Ennismore. The novel is strong in situation of a kind; but it is too artificial to be convincing. Why, for instance, Lady Ennismore should have kept her secret at such enormous risk is not made clear.

Miss Lily Perks has made excellent capital out of somewhat unpromising materials. A bright, handsome woman of the world, Claudia Harland, is affianced to a man very much of her own status, socially and intellectually; but while rusticated in a village in the Orkneys she meets a clever person named Percival Lee, who attracts her. Her niece, Elfried Mowbray, who is with her, is also turned from her allegiance by a young fellow much better suited to her than the doctrinaire to whom she is engaged. This man had moved her intellectual side. Bitten with Socialistic ideas she finds in him a sympathiser, and mistakes this academic interest for love. Her awakening brings forth fruit making for her happiness; but Claudia not only loses her husband that was to be, but is unable to take the substitute that the gods spitefully dangled before her. Miss Perks tells her tale with discretion and artistic reticence.

Mr. Frederick White has written an eminently clever and readable book. It has originality, even though the author is somewhat indebted to the "Faust" legend. Arthur Greenstrand is a congenital sceptic—he believes in neither God nor man. His friend, Julien Ray, believes in both. Greenstrand makes Ray a bet that any man would fall if the temptation offered him were sufficient. Greenstrand, being a millionaire, is able to put his faith (or shall we say lack of faith?) to a series of crucial tests, employing as the instrument in this amiable work his secretary, Mr. Death, a man of iron will and absolute sangfroid. A series of test experiments is given. Death discovers men who have exigent unsatisfied needs, or who are in great straits, and appealing to them in their weak moments succeeds invariably in compassing their fall. Meanwhile, Greenstrand has fallen in love with a beautiful and sweet girl, Margaret Trefrook, and believing in her against his will, wishes that Death would at last fail, and so refute his own theory. In the end Death does fail. He is beginning to hate the work imposed upon him and the man who set him about it. To revenge himself upon his employer, he puts a tremendous temptation in the path of Margaret Trefrook's brother. This comes to Margaret's knowledge. She fears her brother will fall. The tension sends her mad, and in her madness she kills herself. The shock effects a moral revolution in Greenstrand's character. He forsakes his immoral work, and saddened and broken-hearted goes about the world striving to make his wealth effective for good rather than evil. Of course this dénouement is conventional, and the author shows weakness in not choosing some of his subjects from the more ordinary ruts of life. Still, on the whole, the work faithfully reflects the weakness and strength, goodness and evil of human nature.

Hathersage is melodrama with the "chill off"—in fact, it is a somewhat dull tale, though it is not badly written and is not without its moments. There is a good son and a wicked one. Felix, the elder, is virtuous; but having incurred his father's displeasure he leaves home, and returns to find that the old man has died leaving everything to Bella, a niece to whom his brother Harold is engaged. Harold shoots his brother and thinks he has killed him. Ultimately Felix confounds Harold and virtue is rewarded. It is, perhaps, scarcely fair to summarise Mr. Hall's tale in this perfunctory manner, though it lacks features which can be laid hold of to distinguish it. It is not a bad piece of workmanship, but its pattern is somewhat hackneyed and old fashioned. The sub-title is "A Tale of North Derbyshire"; and if it presented a vivid picture of peasant life in that district, we should allow that all other faults were condoned. But, frankly, we do not think it does.

Mrs. Forrester's collection of short stories are unexceptional from the moral point of view, and at least we may say they do sometimes administer adroit blows at the insincerity and corruptness of Society. But a score or more of such tales is a little too much. It would almost seem that this order of fiction must either be over-sophisticated or insipid.

It has often puzzled the present writer how persons of moderate intelligence and education can pass their time in the consumption of the ordinary novel, just as it is inexplicable how the same persons can endure the heat and inconvenience of the theatres night after night to witness indifferent acting and hear plays containing absolutely nothing in the way of fibre or novelty. Still the explanation is obvious enough. The ordinary man is too indolent to reserve himself for good novels and good plays, and too uncritical to care for them. To such novel readers and playgoers—and they make up, if we add the women, ninety-nine in a hundred—Mr. Joseph Conrad's extremely able story, An Outcast of the Islands, is not to be recommended. The book would bore them; they would find it dull. It is, however, anything but dull. It is a remarkably clever psychological study, and shows that its author is a keen student of the subtleties and wayward contradictions of individual character. Mr. Conrad's command of English is equal to his insight into human nature. His diction is round and picturesque; we can best describe his style by calling it mellow. The principal character, Willems, is a very real person. He lands in Macassar an outcast, and in course of time becomes confidential agent to one Hudig, a trader. He has married into the Da Souza family, who are half-castes. Consumedly vain, it fills his little soul to lord it over his wife and her family: to be the great man among inferiors. Led on by a paltry ambition he cheats, or at all events takes undue advantage of his opponents at cards, and by a natural transition ends by betraying his master's confidence. However, it would ill requite Mr. Conrad to attempt to give a résumé of his tale. Its excellence lies in his way of telling it, and in the cleverly drawn surroundings of the figures who play their parts in the story. The later episodes, wherein Willems falls in love with a beautiful savage, are narrated with conspicuous power and artistic reticence. Mr. Conrad is to be heartily congratulated upon his performance; it falls little, if at all, short of being a masterpiece.

Although Mrs. Oscar Beringer's book is scarcely food for babes and sucklings, it is free from conscious offence. Undoubtedly the theme is risky, and the inferences drawn from it will be various. Margaret, a beautiful, innocent girl, is loved by her playfellow Teddy. During a thunderstorm she swoons in his arms. An over-mastering temptation overtakes the young man, and almost automatically he yields to it. The next moment he is struck by the lightning and killed. Soon afterwards Margaret is wooed by Henry Bethune, and his love is prosperous. A month after his marriage he finds that the wife, the emblem to him of stainless purity, is about to become a mother. In his despair he goes to his friend Dick Cunningham, a doctor, who succeeds in re-establishing his faith. Bethune recalls the wedding night, when he stood awed by his wife's innocence. Such a theme as this would be impossible were it badly treated; but Mrs. Beringer has justified her temerity by being in some measure convincing. The tragedy of Lady Arbuthnot's life affords an effective background to this weird conceit. Her character is drawn with skill of no mean order.

Mr. Ralph Adams Cram is a past master of the art of heaping horror on horror's head. His ghost stories are original, and they are well told, though we think "No. 252 Rue M. le Prince" oversteps the bounds of decency. In many of his tales, in "The Dead Valley" especially, the horror is so vividly presented as to make itself felt. We cannot commend the book to nervous persons; but, if they must read it, let it be an hour before rising rather than an hour before going to bed. In the pale, uncomplaining light of early morning the horror will have lost its poignancy.

Mrs. Stannard's latest story is as workmanlike as her stories are wont to be. Her tale is a sad one. Waldemar von Ruysdael is a violinist of magnificent, though unproclaimed, power. His wife and child are starving, and ultimately the child dies. The wife, who is attractive but shallow, never forgives the husband for the loss of her child. Presently she goes further and sells herself to shame. Tragedy follows tragedy. Waldemar comes to loathe the woman who had deserted him in the hour of his need. Now, triumphantly successful, he falls in love with Mary Hamilton, but this young girl must marry Baron Oosterderg to save her father. The Baron, an abandoned roué, had been the seducer, if the term can be used, of Ruysdael's wife. There is nothing saved from the wreckage, but the Baroness's beauty and Ruysdael's fame.

JAS. STANLEY LITTLE.

MODERN PORTUGUESE LITERATURE. I Nuovi Poeti Portoghesi. By Antonio Padula. (Naples.)

In the person of Signor Padula yet another recruit has joined that growing band of students, which has its representatives in every European country, engaged in the task of exhibiting, by means of translations and critical studies, the literary riches of Portugal, both ancient and modern. Prof. W. Storck and Karl von Reinhardtsoettner in Germany, (the former the oldest worker in this field); Maxime Formont, Achille Millien, and L. P. de Brinn' Gaubast in France; Göran Björkman in Sweden; Tommaso Cannizzaro and P. Zuppone-Strani in Italy; several in Spain, not to speak of Poland and Roumania—these are some of the men who have created a new branch of study, and taught the reading public in their respective countries that the poetry of Camoens is not the be-all and end-all of Portuguese literature, as was generally believed on the continent not so long ago, and still finds credence among English critics who ought to know better.

Following the example of Maxime Formont—whose articles on "Le Mouvement Poétique Contemporain en Portugal," published in the Revue du Siècle during 1892, surpass in careful appreciation anything that has yet appeared, whether in or out of Portugal, on the same subject—Signor Padula furnishes a brief account of the chief literary figures of the last half century, and accompanies it with an estimate of the value of their output. Despite his title, he does not limit himself to a study of the poetry, but commences by passing under review the foremost prose-writers as well, including the historians from Heroullano to Oliveira Martins, the novelists from Camillo to Eça de Queiroz, dramatists like Garrett, literary critics, and so forth. Among the poets he devotes particular attention, and justly, to João de Deus and Anthero de Quental, singers of widespread fame, owing to the many versions of their masterpieces that have been made and printed of late years. The last chapter of the volume contains a description of the so-called Symbolists and their chief, Eugenio de Castro, whose dramatic poem, "Belkiss," was reviewed in the ACADEMY last August.

It must be confessed that Signor Padula has more than once mistaken melodious versifiers for poets, and he gives undue prominence to certain living bards who shall be nameless. But in this respect he errs in good company; for both Prof. Storck and Dr. Björkman, in their recent anthologies, have allowed some weeds to creep in among the flowers, and joined with great names men who are not held worthy of serious attention in their native land. Still, this want of discrimination does much to destroy the balance of the book. To take one example only, Signor Padula fails to make it clear how far superior, in the necessary combination of thought and felicity of expression, are the lyrics of João de Deus, the sonnets of Anthero and "Os Simples" of Junqueiro, to most, if not all, of the verse which has issued from the Portuguese press during the period of which he treats. Again, we are unable to subscribe to his unstinted praise of the prose, and still less of the poetry, of Theophilo Braga—very meritorious and sometimes unique as are the services he has rendered in many domains of literature. A Positivist born out of due time, Theophilo too often permits his hatred of Catholicism to cloud his mental vision; and this, together with a habit of inaccuracy and a shallow analysis, that speaks of hurried work, seriously impairs the value of his otherwise splendid achievement—the fifteen volumes of the Historia da literatura Portuguesa. As a rule, however, Signor Padula shows accuracy, not to say penetration, in the judgments he formulates: as, for instance, in his remarks on the historical attempts of Rebello da Silva, and in the comparison he institutes between the romances of Heroullano and Garrett, while his impartiality is deserving of praise.

In conclusion, we would suggest that in a second edition of his little book Signor Padula should enlarge its scope, and, restricting the space too liberally awarded to minor bards, devote more attention to the commanding personalities of Garrett and Heroullano, in their many-sided activity, as also to the remarkable pamphlets of Anthero de Quental and the fiction of Camillo Castello Branco, so characteristically Portuguese in its shortcomings no less than in its high qualities. Also, if the name of D. Alice Moderno be retained, he would do well to introduce that of D. Claudia de Campos, Portugal's most brilliant lady writer, and say something of her short stories and her last volume of psychological studies, entitled Mulheres, with its long and thoughtful essay on Charlotte Brontë.

SOME BOOKS ON THE COLONIES.

"STORIES OF THE NATIONS." — The West Indies and the Spanish Main. By James Rodway. (Fisher Unwin.) The story of the West Indies and the Spanish Main is the story of many nations: Carib and Negro, Briton, Frenchman and Spaniard, Dutchman, Dane, and Jew have all played their parts, with much effusion of blood and loss of treasure. Ambition, slavery, murder, treachery, piracy—most things but honest industry—fill the pages of the barest recital of the story. The stage is thronged with ruffians who are perpetually being wiped out by fresh gangs; and only now and then honourable fighters like Rodney, Hood, and De Grasse capture the imagination. The thing has gone on from the times of Columbus (doubtless before him) down to yesterday's newspaper, and it would puzzle any economist to say what it is all about. From the Darien Scheme to the Panama Canal there is a story of wrecked enterprise. Tobacco and rum have been the most consistently thriving industries—the only bright spots in the gloom. In the telling of it all within a few hundred pages, Mr. Rodway has to race through the crowded events like a literary scorching. If he had attempted less, we should not have had to lament the absence of the literary charm of his sketches of West Indian forest life, which have placed his name so high in the estimation of lovers of nature. He has tried to tell everything, where much might well be spared. In spite of this want of perception of the values of events, the book has the great merit of an accurate story, in telling which the author has been at great pains to reach the truth and to form correct judgments on thorny questions. It has the further advantage of being the only short history of the West Indies that has this crowning merit of accuracy.

Henry Callaway, M.D., D.D., First Bishop for Kaffraria. A Memoir by Marian S. Benham. (Macmillan.) Miss Benham is to be congratulated upon her success in compiling this life of that very interesting character, Henry Callaway, Physician and Bishop. Dr. Callaway's career illustrates the paramount importance of sound religious teaching and guidance in early life. It is obvious that, deeply religious and easily impressed as he was from the age of sixteen, what he wanted was a stronger and sober mind to influence and guide him, and, if we may say so without offence, to keep him straight. As it happened, for want of better direction, his religious feelings led him to leave the Church of England and join the Society of Friends. Having once joined the Quakers, he seems to have gradually become more and more disappointed with the spiritual working of their system, or rather with the absence of it, so that after seventeen years of much mental conflict and suffering he returned to the Church which he had left when a boy, without really knowing what he was leaving or whither he was going. In the meantime, with all sorts of mental distress and doubts on the lawfulness of secular occupation, he had studied medicine with so much success that in a few years he created a practice in London of £1000 a year. This is a sufficient proof of his ability. In after life, while speaking of the immense amount of strictly secular work he had to attend to, but which became very light when regarded as a part of his ministry, he looks back to how as a young man he used to groan under his secular occupations. Dr. Callaway was ordained and settled in South Africa in 1854, and in 1873 was consecrated as missionary bishop for independent Kaffraria. In 1886 his health, never strong, having broken down, he resigned his charge, and, returning to England, died at Ottery St. Mary in 1890, at the age of seventy-five. In addition to his devotion to the great cause in which he was engaged, he was a man of immense industry, of wise moderation, of tender affections, and of great consideration for others. He did a great work among the Kaffirs, and not only among them. In 1871 he writes:

"I cannot conceive any right-minded man—any Christian minister with a spark of the love of Christ burning within him—anyone possessed of a clear comprehension of the work of his Church in the world—finding it possible to sit still and confine his attention to the coloured races, when he sees his own countrymen, Christians by descent and profession, sinking into lower and lower degradation around him."

The Transvaal and the Boers. A brief History. By W. E. Garrett Fisher. (Chapman & Hall.) The historical portion of this book consists mainly of extracts from the works of Theal, Nixon, Carter, Aylward, and others. It is a pity that the author should perpetuate so ridiculous a misquotation as "crushed, cabined, and confined." The portion which refers to the events of our own time is fairly well done. The extraordinary blundering of every Englishman in authority who had to do with the Transvaal—from Lord Carnarvon and Sir Theophilus Shepstone to Sir Owen Lanyon, Lord Wolseley, and Sir George Colley—is well brought out, as is also the success which has attended the crafty persistence of President Krüger in all his dealings with the English Government. Mr. Fisher remarks on

"the vacillating conduct which England has always displayed towards the Boers, who are, unfortunately, not sufficiently educated to comprehend that vacillation or mildness in the conduct of a State can arise from any other cause than weakness."

Mr. Fisher claims to be no partisan, but to present a brief and colourless view of the policy of President Krüger; still, his sympathies seem to incline towards the Boers. His last chapter treats of the struggle of the Outlanders for political rights; and he very properly abstains from entering on the question of Dr. Jameson's conduct.

Campaigning in South Africa and Egypt. By Major-General W. C. F. Molyneux. (Macmillans.) Major-General Molyneux, who comes of an old fighting stock, joined the army in December, 1864. He gives a pleasant and lively account of the service he has seen, principally in South Africa. He had been invalided home when the disaster of Isandhlwana occurred, but returned in time to take part in the final campaign against Cetewayo. It was in this campaign that he became intimate with the Prince Imperial, whom he describes as "a charming young fellow, burning to distinguish himself, a capital rider and swordsman; but, of course, like all high-spirited young men, a little difficult to manage,"

and again:

"How could one help loving a boy like that—brave, dashing to rashness, and determined to make a name for himself to add to the records of his race! But with all our love we were terribly anxious about him."

The general has some sensible remarks on the folly of parcelling out the territory of the conquered Zulus among thirteen petty chiefs. General Molyneux finishes his book with the Egyptian campaign of 1882, in which he took part, being present at Tel-el-Kebir. Among various interesting remarks, he tells us that horses do not seem, like men, to be deceived by the mirage—no matter how thirsty they may be, they never rush wildly for what to their riders seems a lake; and "only experience," he says, "can teach the difference colour makes as regards heat. In the scarlet jacket one was comfortable even in the fiercest sun, while the blue one was simply unbearable. No doubt, too, there is a good deal in imagination; put on your smoked glasses, the day turns to dusk and you feel cool; take them off for a minute, and the heat seems terrible."

Old Melbourne Memories. By Rolf Boldrewood. (Macmillans.) These reminiscences were first published in the columns of the Australasian, and, we are told, awakened an amount of general interest most gratifying to the writer. This we can well understand. The readers of the Australasian probably knew most of the places and many of the people, and possibly some of the horses about which Rolf Boldrewood gossips; but to us the Memories appear much too purely local and far too slight to interest many readers in this country. Nevertheless, we observe, the book before us is a second edition. Probably the author's brisk and easy style carries the reader on, even when the matter on which he is engaged is of but slender value.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. JOHN LANE will publish on Tuesday next Mr. Egerton Castle's rendering into French of R. L. Stevenson's Prince Otto. Under its French garb the book will be known as "Le Roman du Prince Othon." Mr. Egerton Castle, a writer of many books both of imagination and of research, is one of the very few men of letters who are able to use two languages with equal ease and knowledge.

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK has nearly ready for publication, with Messrs. Macmillan & Co., a First Book of Jurisprudence, addressed to readers who have laid the foundation of a liberal education and are beginning the special study of law. In the first part he has tried to set forth in language intelligible to scholars who are not yet lawyers so much of the general notions underlying legal discussions as is needful for the removal of the most pressing difficulties. The second part, which is more practical and more exclusively addressed to students of the common law, contains, among other things, a connected account of the sources and authorities of English law.

MESSRS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS have in the press, for immediate publication, Camping in the Canadian Rockies, by Mr. Walter D. Wilcox, of Washington, treating of excursions and explorations in the country near Banff and Lake Louise, and also in the Selkirk Range. Besides giving graphic descriptions of adventures during several years of camp life in this picturesque region, the author makes a comparison between the territory described and other parts of the Dominion, and gives in a general way the main features of the geology, botany, fauna, and climatic conditions of the mountains. The work will be handsomely issued in large octavo, with full-page photogravure plates and illustrations in the text.

MR. WILLIAM EVARTS BENJAMIN, of New York, announces, in an edition limited to 250 copies, The Continent of America, its Discovery and its Baptism, by Mr. John Boyd Thacher, being a critical and bibliographical inquiry into the naming of America and into the growth of the cosmography of the New World, together with an attempt to establish the land-fall of Columbus on Watling Island, and the subsequent discoveries and explorations on the mainland by Americus Vesputius. The work will be illustrated with a number of drawings and maps.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has nearly ready for issue a thoroughly revised edition of his Handbook to Ireland, with a new set of maps that have been specially prepared on a large scale.

THE next volume of Messrs. Ward, Lock & Bowden's "Nineteenth Century Classics" will be Carlyle's Heroes and Hero Worship, with an introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse.

MR. ELLIOT STOCK announces for immediate publication A Handbook of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring, in view of the coming Bayreuth Festival. It will give a general introduction to the work, and explain the text of the four operas.

MR. DAVID CUTHBERTSON, of the Edinburgh University Library, has just completed a translation, with a memoir and notes, of the rare work entitled La Vie de Fénelon, written by the Chevalier Ramsay, and published anonymously at the Hague in 1723. It will be issued to subscribers in October, through Messrs. J. & R. Parlane, of Paisley.

THE first annual meeting of the Library Assistants' Association will be held on Wednesday next, at 8 p.m., in the rooms of the Library Association, 20, Hanover-square. Mr. Peddie, the chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, will give an account of the year's work and a sketch of the programme for next session. The officers and committee for 1896-97 will be elected. Librarians and library assistants are invited to attend.

WE are asked to state that the library and reading-room of the Royal Irish Academy will be closed from July 6 to 18, both days inclusive.

THE committee of the Leeds Public Library have accepted an offer from Messrs. Hardy & Page, of Lincoln's Inn, to report upon the muniments of the corporation prior to the year 1800.

THE Caxton Chaucer, from the library of Mr. R. E. Saunders, of Dorchester, was sold on Tuesday at Sotheby's to Mr. Bernard Quaritch for £1880, which is only £70 less than the highest price ever given for a Caxton at auction in this country.

ON Thursday next Messrs. Sotheby will begin the sale—which will last altogether for five days—of the valuable library of books and MSS. left by the late Sir Edward Herbert Bannbury, of Barton Hall, Bury St. Edmunds. It is evidently not so much a working library, collected with a view to his own classical and geographical studies, as an inheritance from his ancestors, such as are often to be found in old country houses. It is specially rich in Americana, including Sir Walter Raleigh's Empire of Guiana, and Capt. John Smith's Historie of Virginia. There are also copies of the first and fourth folios of Shakespeare; presentation copies of John Evelyn, Abraham Cowley, and Dr. Edward Young; and books from the libraries of James I., Charles II., and Louis XIII. We may further mention a copy of Sir Thomas Hanmer's Shakespeare, together with a set of the original drawings by Francis Hayman that were designed and engraved for this edition; and a MS. of Juvenal, written in Italy in 1464.

ON Saturday of this week Messrs. Sotheby will also begin the sale—lasting altogether for four days—of the library of the late Robert Addison, of Appleby, which comprises a number of books relating to the history, topography, ballads, and folklore of the northern counties.

SIGNOR ARTURO FARINELLI has lately published, under the title of Don Giovanni: Note critiche (Turin and Rome: Loescher), the study of the legend and literary history of Don Juan de Tenorio, which appeared originally in the Giornale Storico della Letteratura Italiana. He traces the story from its origin in mythology and folk-lore to its naturalisation in Spain, and its subsequent migrations, imitation, and development in the literature of every European country. This pamphlet of 149 pages is an excellent example of historical bibliography and literary criticism.

THE FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

IN the forthcoming number of the Classical Review Dr. Verrall will essay to prove that the commonly received date of Tyrtæus is erroneous, and that the poet took part in the third Messenian war of the fifth century instead of the second Messenian war of the seventh. Dr. Verrall examines the extant testimonia, and shows that they are compatible with the later date, which the language and style of the poems ascribed to Tyrtæus demand.

AMONG the contents of the July number of Cosmopolis will be: "Civilisation in South Africa," by Sir Charles Dilke; "Italy, Rome, and the Franco-Prussian War," by Mme. White Mario; "The Cellini of Lithography," by Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pennell; and a story by Mr. I. Zangwill, entitled "Chad Gadyad."

THE July number of the Scottish Review will contain an article on "The Worship of Serapis," by Mr. F. Legge, in which he seeks to identify the Ptolemaic deity of that name with the Babylonian Merodach.

MISS CHARLOTTE M. YONGE contributes a paper on "Stepmothers" to the July number of Mothers in Council, which will also contain an answer to the question, "Why do our Daughters Revolt?" by Mrs. John Acland.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE general board of studies at Cambridge recommend that steps be taken for the immediate appointment of a professor of mental philosophy and logic—the last of three new chairs required to be founded by the University Commissioners. In order that the salary may be at once made up to the full amount of £700 a year, Prof. Henry Sidgwick has voluntarily offered that the salary of his own chair—the Knightsbridge professorship of moral philosophy—should be reduced to £500 so long as he continues to hold it.

THE executive committee of the Hausa Association have offered to endow a lectureship of the Hausa language at Cambridge, with a salary of £100 for three years. The Pitt Press has also undertaken to publish the Hausa MSS. which Mr. C. H. Robinson, the student of the Hausa Association, brought back from his recent visit to Kano, in Central West Africa.

THE Indian Institute at Oxford being now complete in all its parts, the ceremony of inauguration will be performed on Wednesday next, by Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India; and in the evening a conversazione will be held in the building by Sir M. Monier-Williams. Among the latest benefactors are the Thakur Sahib of Gondal, who has contributed £4500; and Raja Sir Sourindro Mohan Tagore, of Calcutta, who has presented a magnificent collection of Indian musical instruments and other gifts, and also written and set to music some Sanskrit odes, which will be sung during the proceedings on Wednesday.

THE Rev. Dr. Chase having resigned the principalship of St. Mary Hall, to which he was appointed so long ago as 1857, the buildings will be taken over by Oriel College at the end of the present term. The only one of the old Oxford Halls then remaining will be that of St. Edmund, to which the University Commissioners conceded a continuance of life, in close connexion with Queen's College.

THE Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has decided that the student interpreters appointed to missions and consulates in Turkey, Persia, and the Levant, shall this year proceed for instruction to Cambridge, and not to Oxford. In consequence, Dr. Charles Wells has vacated his office of lecturer in Turkish at Oxford, towards the salary of which the Foreign Office made a grant of £200 a year.

TWO studentships have been granted by the trustees of the Aubrey Moore Memorial of Oxford, as follows: £30 to the Rev. Llewellyn J. M. Bebb, of Brasenose, to enable him to visit Russia, with a view to investigating MSS. of the Septuagint; and £20 terminally, for three terms, to Mr. Henry H. Williams, of Queen's.

IT appears that the costs incurred by the University of Oxford, in obtaining the consent of the Court of Chancery to change the title of the new Ford chair of English history from "professor" to "reader," amount altogether to no less than £323, which it is proposed to defray out of the accumulated income of the fund.

AT a special meeting of Convocation of the University of London, held on Wednesday, Mr. Walter Rivington received 963 votes for the vacant fellowship, as compared with 846 given to Sir Joseph Lister. It is understood that the former is opposed to the scheme for re-organising the university as a local teaching body.

THE distribution of prizes in the faculties of arts and science will be held at University College, London, on Wednesday next, at 3 p.m., with Sir John Erichsen, president, in the chair.

AT the annual gathering of past and present members of Queen's College, Harley-street, which was held on Saturday last, the principal (the Rev. Dr. C. J. Robinson) stated that Durham University had offered to reckon three years spent satisfactorily at Queen's College as equivalent to one year spent at Durham, with a view to a degree. In order to commemorate the jubilee of the college, which will occur in 1898, it has been resolved to undertake extensive alterations in the buildings, at a total cost of £6000, of which upwards of one half has already been promised.

A GILCHRIST travelling studentship for women teachers of the value of £70 will be awarded in December by the council of the Cambridge Training College for Women. The educational problems approved by the trustees and all other information can be obtained from Miss E. P. Hughes, to whom applications should be sent not later than November 1.

THE late Mrs. Edwin Henry King, of Brighton, has bequeathed £10,000 to the McGill University, Montreal.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE June number of the Economic Journal (Macmillan) opens with a report of the proceedings of the recent meeting of the British Economic Association, at which the late Léon Say made his last public appearance. To the obituary notice of him by his countryman, Prof. Charles Gide, of Montpellier, are appended a few words of personal appreciation, signed "C. J. G." The most important article in the number is that on "Ireland's Place in the Financial System of the United Kingdom," by Prof. C. F. Bastable, of Trinity College, Dublin. He argues that the statistical data, upon which much of the discussion as to Irish over-taxation have been based, are too speculative for practical employment. The real case is not one of country against country, but of the classes with low wages against the better paid artisans and the lower middle classes. As a palliative of the existing inequality, he suggests the abolition of the duty on tea and a modification of the duty on tobacco: spirits he would leave as they are. Second in interest we would rank "The Burden of Small Debts," by Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet, which is really an examination of the working of the credit system in the East-end of London. She condemns it as an almost unmitigated evil, except where lending is based upon personal knowledge and confidence. Mr. T. A. Finlay, vice-president of the Irish Agricultural Organisation Society, gives an account of what has been attempted in the way of co-operative agriculture in Ireland, mainly borrowed from Danish precedents; and Mr. H. H. Vivian describes a society that has recently been founded in London for co-operative production in the building trade, which now consists of eighteen branches, with about 800 members and a capital of over £1000.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE "DRUMMOND CASTLE."

(Lost off Ushant with 250 souls, June 16, 1896.)

Into Thy hands, O Lord!

Whether on land or on sea,
In darkest night or at noonday bright,
We must one day come unto Thee.

Into Thy hands, O Lord!

May those who have pass'd away
Find rest and grace, and abiding place,
Till the last great judgment day.

Into Thy hands, O Lord!

Thou takest to Thee Thine own,
And the ship went down at night,
When never a storm had blown.

Into Thy hands, O Lord!

Ah! yes, they are safe with Thee;
But what to those who are left behind,
When their hearts have gone down at sea?

Into Thy hands, O Lord!

There is nothing on earth has power
To comfort and help these souls
Through this dark and terrible hour.

Yet "into Thy hands, O Lord!"

Whether on land or on sea,
In darkest night or in noonday bright,
May our dearest be safe through Thee.

FLORENCE PRACOCK.

HONORARY DEGREES AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE following are the Latin speeches delivered by the Public Orator (Dr. Sandys) in presenting to the Vice-Chancellor the several recipients of honorary degrees at Cambridge on June 18.

T. M. C. ASSEN.

"Batavorum e gente sollertissima, Grotii e patria celeberrima, virum insignem ad nos feliciter advectum Senatus nostri nomine libenter salutamus. Salutamus Iuris Gentium Institutum e conditoribus unum, Institutum eiusdem plus quam semel praesidis vicarium, virum inter populares suos non modo de fluminis Rheni navigatione sed etiam de rebus externis consilium constitutum. Nuper populorum complurium legati, de iuris gentium legibus ad certam quandam normam dirigendis et componendis publice deliberantes, neminem alium habuerunt praesidem. Viro tanto gratulamur quod praecepta, philoso-phorum in disputationibus ad gentium leges inter se contrarias in concordiam redigendas; per tot sæcula elaborata, mox, ut speramus, non sine magno mercatorum omnium beneficio, non sine mutuo vitæ commodorum multorum fructu, auctoritate publica inter omnes gentes rata erunt et confirmata."

FELIX LIEBERMANN.

"Leges Angliæ antiquas, sive Edwardi confessoris, sive Willelmi, sive Henrici primi nomines nuncupatas, rudi et indigesta mole diu confusas, ab hoc viro in ordinem tandem redactas et luculenter illustratas animo grato recordamur. Recordamur annorum viginti labores legibus nostris antiquis summa industria, summa solertia investigandis ab eodem dedicatos. Recordamur denique annalium nostrorum memoriam obscuram inter Germaniæ antiquæ monumenta ab eodem clara in luce collocatam. Ergo virum ab imperatore Germano professoris titulo merito decoratum, etiam Universitatis nostra doctoris nomine libenter exornat. Oilm maioribus nostris rex Angliæ Henricus primus leges Edwardi regis sese redditurum esse promisit; a doctore nostro, leges nostras antiquas nobis propediem reddituro, regis nostri promissa aliquando nobis denuo exhibentur."

PROF. DE GOMES.

"Ex ipsis Bentleii nostri temporibus inter Bataviæ et Britanniae viros doctos vetus necessitudo intercessit. Eo libentius hodie e Batavia ad nos advectum salutamus linguæ Arabicæ professorem insignem, linguæ eiusdem professoris nostri desideratissimi institutionum grammaticarum editorem, qui bibliothecæ Lugdunensis codices orientales denuo describendos sibi sumpsit, qui poetæ Moellmi carmina primus edidit, qui non modo historicorum Arabicorum fragmenta sed etiam historiæ Arabicæ annales antiquos undique conquisitos cum aliis consociatus recensuit, qui geographorum denique Arabicorum bibliothecam solus condidit. Idem, ne plura commemorem, non regionum modo expugnationis librum ipse accuratissime edidit, sed etiam alios adjuvare semper paratus, omnium animos sibi subjugavit, omnium corda expugnavit."

L'ABBÉ LOUIS DUCHESNE.

"Roma ab ipsa ad nos pervenit vir et de rebus sacris et de antiquitatis studiis præclare meritis, qui librum Pontificalem prolegomenis amplissimis et commentario doctissimo illustravit, qui Galliæ antiquæ fastos episcopales condidit, qui cognoscendæ antiquitatis causa neque montem Athon neque insulam Patmon inexploratam reliquit. Idem, ad argumenta altiora evectus, non modo cultus Christiani initia luculenter enarravit, sed etiam in ipsis originibus Christianis investigandis nuperrime est veratus. Laetamur inter Anglos adesse hodie virum summa eruditione, summo animi candore præditum, qui liberalitate vere Christiana, animo vere fraterno, etiam Ecclesiam Anglicanam respicit, qui Cantabrigiæ denique pauper moratus non oblitiscitur unum certe e Collegiis nostris habuisse quondam magistrum Matthæum Parker, archiepiscopum Cantuariensem, per quem ordines sacre in Ecclesiam Anglicanam serie perpetua defluxisse credimus."

M. SAMUEL BERGER.

"Salutamus deinceps virum de popularibus suis propterea præsertim bene meritum, quod non modo de studiorum Hebræorum primordiis libellum conscripserit, sed etiam Verbi Dei in linguam popularem redditi historicam fastus exposuit; qua in historia non ingratus Cantabrigiensi quod psalmorum in codice quodam Cantabrigiensi interpretationis Gallicanæ fontem antiquissimum esse ostendit. Salutamus virum, qui etiam Universitatis nostræ præceptores in studiis sacris peregre occupatos summa benevolentia, summa amicitia adjuvit. Salutamus denique virum, qui Ecclesiæ totius partem occidentalem eo nomine ad se devinxit quod Scripturæ Sacre editionem vulgatam non sine magno fructu laborum plurimorum argumentum sibi elegit. Non multis certe contingit, ut non modo de patria, sed etiam de gente vicina, neque de una alterave tantum gente, sed etiam de Ecclesia occidentali universa bene meriti sint."

PROF. FRANCIS ANDREW MARSH.

"Adest deinceps vir quem inter fratres nostros transmarinos philologiæ Teutonice Nestorem nominaverim. Cum fratribus autem nostris non modo generis sed etiam linguæ communis necessitudine coniuncti, inter nomines Anglici heredes honore non levi eum dignum arbitramur, qui linguæ nostræ communis ipsos fontes feliciter exploravit, linguam nostram matrem velut aliam matrem ante omnia dilexit, de grammaticæ denique Anglo-Saxonice opus ingenio magno, doctrina varia, simplicitate admirabili, philologiæ denique spiritu instinctum orbi terrarum donavit. Idem maris Atlantici in litore utroque lexicorum magnorum auctoribus adiutor strenuus existit, solus inter populares suos societati philologiæ Londinensi honoris causa adscriptus. Quem nuper in honorem anni septuagesimi feliciter expleti uno die oratores decem patrio in sermone laudibus cumularunt, huius certe meritis pro rei dignitate commemorandis neque lingua Latina neque unus orator hodie sufficit."

PROF. SIMON NEWCOMB.

"Si Thales ille Milesius, 'rerum naturæ certissimus explorator et astrorum peritissimus contemplator,' sapiens propterea nominatus est, quod solem lunæ oppositu solere deficere primus omnium vidisse fertur, etiam hunc virum sapientiæ laude non indignum arbitramur, qui solis et lunæ defectus omnes antiquitus observatos cum astronomiæ legibus hodiernis accuratissime comparavit. Idem quanto ingenii acuminis aliorum de lunæ motu placita correxit; quam admirabili studiorum cælestium cognitione cum Neptuni inventore nostro consociatus est; quam infinita denique cura fratribus nostris transmarinis trans æquora navigantibus siderum cursus litterarum monumentis mandatis explicavit. Talium virorum de genere humano merita dum contemplamur, non iam miramur ipsum Vergilium a Musis esse precatum, ut sibi ante omnia

'casique vias et sidera monstrent, defectus solis varios lunæque labores.'"

CORRESPONDENCE.

A NEW CHAUCER MS.

Oxford: June 21, 1896.

One often hears it said that, what with the publication by the Chaucer Society of the most important Chaucer MSS., and the pointing out of many of Chaucer's sources and fixing of our knowledge of his language by painstaking research, there now remains little to be done in the field. But how incorrect this view is becomes apparent when one reflects that, though we have good critical texts of the less important works of Chaucer's time, we have none of those of Chaucer himself, save for a few of the Minor Poems and the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. In fact, it is only within the past year that the relation of the various MSS. of the Canterbury Tales one to another has been made out, a work indispensable to a correct text.

It would even seem that we have not yet got hold of all the available text material. There has been lying long unnoticed in the Bodleian Library a MS. that contains an English Boethian translation, which the old Bodley Catalogue, the only one for this part of the Bodley collection, describes thus: "Boethii Libri V. de Consolatione Philosophiæ anglice redduntur sed misere." Perhaps the cataloguer would not have been so candid had he known that it was the work of "Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, Kt." that he was describing, although what he says happens to be quite true: he might have put it even more strongly. But no one seems to have suspected from his day to this that the MS. was Chaucer's. What was my surprise, therefore, on referring to MS. Bodley 797, in the hope that it might be another copy of the plagiarised version of Chaucer's Boece (see ACADEMY, March 7, 1896), to find that it was a very good text of the Boece itself. It will not be necessary to give a technical description of the MS.: suffice it to say that it is complete, written on vellum in a late fifteenth century hand, and contains an independent text. It presents, too, a striking peculiarity, in that the scribe has changed many of Chaucer's Romance words to common English expressions—e.g., "felonous" and "felonnie" often appear in his writing as "wicked" and "wickednesse"; in one place where Chaucer has translated "degener" by "forlived," the scribe has put the word in the margin and left a space for it in the text, perhaps because a good substitute did not immediately occur to him. At other points he has attempted to better the text, though most often with but indifferent success. Once or twice, however, he has hit on the reading which is obviously the correct one, though not found in any of the other MSS. In spite of these alterations—and they are quite numerous and sometimes for the better, if one considers only the sense of the translation—the MS. can scarcely represent a later recension of the Boece, for the alterations are often directly at variance with the French text, and often contradict Chaucer's well-known usage.

This MS. brings the list of known copies of the Boece up to nine, counting in Caxton's print, which represents an independent MS., and the Hengwrt fragment, which covers only the first three books. From these, with a comparison with the French version, we ought to be able to get a text that will fairly represent Chaucer's translation of this compendium of medieval philosophy, from which he and his contemporaries drew so largely.

MARK LIDDELL.

WORDSWORTH, COLERIDGE, AND FREDERIKE BRUN.

Bonn a. Rh.: June 4, 1896.

In the Fenwick Note to his well-known ballad "The Seven Sisters, or the Solitude of Binnorie" (comp. 1804), Wordsworth tells us that "the story of this poem is from the German of Frederica Brun." This Frederica Brun (b. 1765, d. 1835) is a now almost forgotten German poetess who, married to the Danish Consul Konstantin Brun, spent the greater part of her life in or near Copenhagen. In her writings she shows herself a decided admirer and imitator of Klopstock, and still more of his less famous pupil Friedrich Matthieson, to whose encouragement and friendly assistance we are indebted for her first volume of poetry, which bears the title: "Gedichte von Friderike Brun, geb. Münster" (Zürich, 1795).

On p. 111 of this little volume we find the following poem, which apparently was Wordsworth's source:

"DIE SIEBEN HUEGEL.

"Auf grüner grüner Heide
Stehn sieben Hügel.
Es flütern Wind' im schaurigen Thal,
Es tanzen Elfen auf mondlichem Strahl.
Singt, Mädeln, auf grüner Heide, Singt: Leide! Leide! Leide!

"Im tiefen Wiesengrunde
Glänzt fern ein Weib' hell.
Es klagen Unken aus tiefem Moor,
Es steigen Gabelde so dunstig empor.
Singt, Mädeln . . . (as above).

"Hier war vor grauen Jahren
Ein König, reich und gross.
Er war gezogen in Krieg und Schlacht,
Hatt' nicht der sieb'n Töchterlein dacht.
Singt, &c.

"Die sieben Jungfrau wallten
Im hohen Buchenhain.
Es rauschte das Meer mit nichtigem Schaum,
Es sauste der Sturm im luftigen Baum.
Singt, &c.
"Es schwellen weisse Seegel
Vom Kulla-Felsen* her.
Ach! Starno kömmt, der wilde Held.
O König! Wie hast du dein Haus bestellt?
Singt, &c.
"An's weisse Sandgestade
Steigt schnell das Kriegerheer.
Die Jungfrau'n fliehen Berg ab und an,
Verfolgt von Reuter, von Ross und Mann.
Singt, &c.
"Wir fah'n euch schnell und sicher,
Ihr weissen Vögelein,
Zu Spott und Hohn, wir fangen euch aus;
Der Vater kann finden das leere Haus!
Singt, &c.
"Wie Blätter vor dem Sturme
Entfloh der Mägdlein Schaar;
Doch dicht am wehenden Schleierlein,
Verfolgten die Reiter sie hinter drein.
Singt, &c.
"Da glänzt im Abendstrahle
Der hüble Weibher hell;
Dreia hüpfen die Mägdlein leicht und sel'n,
Und wurden nimmermehr gesehn.
Singt, &c.
"Auf grüner grüner Heide
Stehn sieben Hügelein.
Dort ruh'n die Jungfrau'n im kühlen Moos,
Dort klagen die Vögelein im Malgespross.
Singt, &c."

The reader will perceive at once that, except that the tomb-hills rise on the shore of the lake rather than out of it, the German poem is substantially the same as Wordsworth's ballad. But the whole has been transplanted into a national atmosphere: the Kulla rocks and the Danish Isle of Seeland are replaced by green Erin and the coast of Scotland; and the nameless and rather shadowy "King, rich and great," the father of the seven sisters, by the head of one of the most powerful and popular Scottish clans, Archibald Campbell; while the impression of the sweeping force of the demonlike "rover" is skilfully heightened by dropping the name of gallant Starno. How Wordsworth came to adopt the name of Binnorie, I do not know. Perhaps it was suggested to him by the well-known old ballad of "The Cruel Sisters" (Child's Ballads i., p. 118) with its refrain of "Binnorie, O Binnorie," which had just come to fresh popularity by Scott's Border Minstrelsy (1802-3).

A few years before Wordsworth another English poet, his friend Coleridge, had made use of one of Mrs. Brun's poems in his "Hymn before Sunrise in the Vale of Chamouni" (published 1802), but without exhibiting the same scrupulosity in pointing out his source. The latter was done, in his piquant way, by De Quincey in Tait's Magazine for September 1834 ("De Quincey's Works," Edinburgh, 1862, vol. ii. p. 44).

"The mere frame-work of the poem," says De Quincey, "is exactly the same—an appeal to the most impressive features of the regal mountain [Mont Blanc] adorning them to proclaim their author: the torrent, for instance, is required to say by whom it had been arrested in its headlong raving, and stiffened, as by the petrific touch of Death, into everlasting pillars of ice; and the answer to these impassioned apostrophes is made by the same choral burst of rapture. In mere logic, therefore, and even as to the choice of circumstances, Coleridge's poem is a translation. On the other hand, by a judicious amplification of some topics,† and by its far deeper tone of lyrical enthusiasm, the dry bones of the German outline have been awakened by Coleridge into the fulness of life. It is not, therefore, a paraphrase, but a re-cast of the original."

How far this is true the reader might judge for himself by comparing Coleridge's Hymn with its German original, printed here from the same volume of Mrs. Brun's, where we have the poem on page 1:

CHAMOUNY BEYM SONNENAUFGANGE.

"AN KLOPFROCK.

"(Im Mai 1791.)

"Aus tiefem Schatten des schweigenden Tannenhains
Erblick ich bebend dich, Scheitel der Ewigkeit, Blendender Gipfel, von dessen Höhe
Ahndend mein Geist ins Unendliche schwebet!

Wer senkte den Pfeiler tief in der Erde Schoos, Der, seit Jahrtausenden, fest deine Masse stützt?
Wer thürmte hoch in des Aethers Wölbung
Mächtig und kühn dein umstrahltes Antlitz?

Wer goss Euch hoch aus des ewigen Winters
Reich,
O Zackenstürme, mit Donnerge'ö' herab?

Und wer gebietet laut mit der Allmacht Stimme:
'Hier sollen ruhen die starrenden Wogen!'

"Wer zeichnet dort dem Morgensterne die Bahn, Wer kränzt mit Blüten des ewigen Frostes Saum?

Wem tüt in schrecklichen Harmonieen, Wilder Avelron, dein Wogentümmel?

"Jehovah! Jehovah! kracht's im berastenden Eis;

Lavinendonner rollen's die Kluft hinab:
Jehovah! rauscht's in den hellen Wipfeln, Flüstert's an rieselnden Silberbüchen."

To the poem are appended a few notes, part of which were almost literally translated by Coleridge in the introductory prose lines which he added in reprinting the hymn, with many alterations, in The Friend of October 26, 1809. They run as follows:

"Chamouny ist eine der höchsten Bergthäler der Barone Faucigny in Savoyen. Es wird seiner romantischen, im Kontrast der wildsten Natur-szenen mit den sanftesten Schönheiten abwechselnden Lage wegen, vorzüglich von Reisenden besucht. Die Kette des Mont Blanc begrenzt es; und, ausser der Arve, wird es von den Gletscherwassern des unaufhaltsam tobenden Avelron, und vier andern, aus den sich ins Thal senkenden Gletschern entstehenden, Schneewässern umrauscht.—Starrende Wogen. Die aus schwindeln-der Höhe in den ungeheuern Felklüften herab-gleitenden Gletscher gleichen gewaltigen Stürmen, die mitten im Tumult der raschesten Bewegung von pösischem Froste gefesselt werden.—Frostes Saum. Ich pflückte am Gletscher du Bouson, wenige Schritte vom ewigen Eis, die schöne

A DISPUTED PASSAGE IN THE "THEOGONIA."

London: June 2, 1896.

In Paley's edition of Hesiod, and in others, Theog. 64-67 are bracketed as spurious, and a line is supposed to be lost after verse 64.

None of the editors of Hesiod, however, so far as I can find, have noticed a curious feature of this passage—a series of plays on the names of the Muses, carried through the disputed verses and into the context. The whole passage (64-71) is as follows:

[Πὰρ δ' αὐτῆς Χάριτες τε καὶ Ἱμερος οἶκ' ἔχουσιν

ἐν ΘΑΛΗΨΙ· ἐπαθὴν δὲ διὰ στόμα ὄσαν λίσσαι ΜΕΛΙΠΟΝΤΑΙ πάντων τε νόμους, καὶ ἥδ' αὖ κεδνὰ ἀθανάτων ΚΑΛΙΟΤΕΙΝ ἐπὶ κρατὶ ὄσαν λίσσαι.]
αἱ τὸν ἴσαν πρὸς Ὀλύμπου ἀγαλλόμεναι ὈΠΙ' ΚΑΛΗΨΙ, ἀμβροσίῳ μολπῇ· περὶ δ' ἴαχε γαῖα μέλαινα ΤΜΝΕΤ' ἄλκις, ἔπατο δὲ πεδῶν ὅτε δοῦπος ὁρώρει νισσομένων πατέρ' εἰς θν' ὃ δ' ὈΥ' ΠΑΝΩΐ ἐμβασιλεύει, κ.τ.λ.

The capitalised words are those containing the Muses' names: there is some ingenuity displayed in the treatment of Calliope. Euterpe and Terpsichore are not accounted for: perhaps the missing line contained some reference to their names, or at least to their common syllable.

This note is written with the purpose of obtaining information more than anything else. I should be glad to know if this little point has been observed before—I can find no hint concerning it in any edition of the Theogonia, or in such of the volumes of the classical journals as I have had the opportunity of consulting. It seems to me to have some bearing on the genuineness of the text: either the suspected passage is authentic, or a much longer passage is spurious. But it must be left to specialists to decide which.

MATT. XXVII. 16, 17.

London: June 22, 1896.

In the "Notes on Select Readings," appended to Westcott and Hort's New Testament, the reading Ἰησοῦ Βαραββάρ is discussed; and though supported by several cursives and the Harklean, and known to Origen and Jerome, it is rejected by the editors. They also mention the fact that Jerome and two scholia translated it "Jesus the son of a teacher." This reading is now supported by the Lewis Syriac, where it is found in verses 16, 17, 20, 21, 26. If to this evidence we add the fact that in all the known Syriac versions Barabbar is divided, and stands ΒΑΡ and not ΒΑΡΒΑΡ, one is led to infer that the reading is genuine, because the Jews very probably chose "Jesus the son of a father" to be released, in derision of our Lord's claim to be the Son of God.

"SCAMELS."

Chilton-sum-Hardy: June 17, 1896.

"Sometimes I'll get thee Young scamels from the rock"
The Tempest, II. ii. 175.

The following passage from the "Journal of Nicholas Ascheton of Downham, in the county of Lancaster, Esquire," has quite escaped the commentators and the dictionaries.

"July 11 [1617]. Two little drafts with scamel only, above Newon. Got abt. 65 fish, and no samon; so home."

The Journal was printed by the Chetham Society in 1848. Dr. Whitaker, who printed it previously in his History of Whalley (1801), writes in a note:

"Scamel, a catch-net; from scamble, catch that catch may.—Cotgrave."

It cannot be said that this throws any further light on Caliban's "young scamels"; but in view of the statement in the "Henry Irving Shakspeare" (ad loc.), that "the word is quite unknown elsewhere," it may be worth while to record its existence.

Bulloch (Studies on the Text of Shakspeare, 1878) has also suggested its connexion with "scamble." He writes:

"Scamels is more likely to have been a coinage put into the mouth of Caliban, a generic term signifying different creatures, birds or quadrupeds, frequenters of rocky heights, and named by him scambles from the verbs scamble and scrambling."

AGASSIZ AND DARWIN.

London: June 19, 1896.

Mr. Stillman seems to forget that I was not writing a Life of Agassiz, but a review of a Life of Agassiz by one who during many years enjoyed the friendship and confidence of that distinguished naturalist. The question is not whether my statements agree with Mr. Stillman's impressions, but whether they are justified by the alleged facts reported in Mr. Marcou's biography. It is perfectly open to Mr. Stillman to dispute the accuracy of those reports, or to show that they are not such as to justify what I have said about Agassiz. He has not attempted to do either; indeed, his letter leaves it very doubtful whether he has so much as read the work on which my article was based.

AN ESSAY IN COMPARATIVE SEMITIC GRAMMAR.

Die babylonisch-assyrischen Präsens- und Präteritalformen in Grundstamm der starken Verba. By Ernest Lindl. (Munich: Lukaschik.)

THIS is an attempt to solve one of the most interesting and important problems of comparative Semitic grammar by the help of Assyrian, which, as Dr. Lindl observes, has very weighty evidence to give upon the matter.

Dr. Lindl has adopted a method which alone can lead to trustworthy results. Instead of dogmatising from a few instances, or first forming his theory, and then bending the facts to it, he has marshalled and classified the forms of the present and past tenses of the verb met with in the Assyro-Babylonian texts, and then noted the conclusions to which these grammatical statistics point. If we are to speculate with any chances of success about the origin of the Semitic verb, we must first know what are the earliest forms of it to which our historical materials allow us to go back. It is of little use to discuss questions of prehistoric philology until we fully know what historical philology can teach us.

The chief object of Dr. Lindl's work is to determine and explain the laws governing the variant vocalisation of the present and preterit—or, as I should prefer to call it, the aorist—in Assyrian. The main result is that the difference in the vowel corresponds with a difference in the signification, transitive verbs having a between the second and third radicals of the present, and u between those of the preterit, while intransitive verbs have u in both cases. Where the present has i instead of a or u, Dr. Lindl inclines to believe that it has a secondary origin, i having developed out of u, though intransitive verbs with an adjectival meaning may have been characterised by it from the first. The two forms which became a present and a preterit in Assyrian (under the influence, as I believe, of Sumerian) will have distinguished the Semitic verb as far back as we can trace its history. Prof. Hommel, however, may be right in holding that there was a still earlier period, when only the longer form (which subsequently became the Assyrian present) was in existence, the shorter form, which originally had a jussive sense, having been derived from it through the retrocession of the accent from the second to the first syllable (yakbul becoming yakbul and then yakbul).

However this may be, Dr. Lindl's results may be considered to be established upon a solid foundation of facts. Our knowledge of the Assyro-Babylonian texts now is—or may be—sufficiently extensive to allow us to use with confidence, as Dr. Lindl has done, what I may call the statistical method. But it must be remembered that, to be used effectively, the statistical method must be also chronological: it is not enough to collect the forms we are investigating, they must also be arranged according to the age of the texts in which they are found. Moreover, we must not lose sight of the fact that differences of form may sometimes be due to dialectal causes. The dialects of Babylonia and Assyria did not always agree together; in Assyria itself we meet with forms like irin for iddin, which belong to the vulgar or non-literary dialect, and in the Tel-el-Amarna and Kappadokian Tablets we may expect to find numerous examples of Western pronunciation. Those who are accustomed to a modern Arabic dialect know well to what an extent the vocalic sounds vary in the mouths of different speakers, i and u, e and o, for instance, in Egyptian Arabic being frequently interchanged. The philologist, therefore, cannot be too grateful that the Babylonian and Assyrian scribes took the trouble to note all the vowel sounds which they themselves heard and spoke, and that their records of pronunciation can be dated back century by century to a remote past. Without the help of Assyriology, comparative Semitic grammar would be doomed to remain, what it has been in the past, in large measure a house of cards.

OBITUARY.

SIR JOSEPH PRESTWICH, D.C.L., F.R.S.

IT is rarely given to a scientific man to carry on his work uninterruptedly over a period of sixty years. Yet Prof. Prestwich's first publication—a paper on the Ichthyolites of Gamrie—was read before the Geological Society so far back as 1835; and his last work, The Tradition of the Flood, appeared in 1895. At the time of his Gamrie paper he was but three-and-twenty years of age, having been born on March 12, 1812. As a relaxation from the cares of a commercial life, he devoted his leisure to original geological work; and some of his early papers relating to the Coalbrookdale coalfield soon established his reputation as an observer gifted with exceptional powers.

Although his geological work extended, during his long life, over a vast range of subjects, it is especially in connexion with the Tertiary and Pleistocene deposits that his name will live as one of the pioneers of British geology. The work of Sir Joseph Prestwich in the London and Hampshire basins has become classical. In working out their details he established the existence of the Thanet Sands as a distinct division of the Lower Tertiaries; he pointed out the equivalence of the beds at Reading and at Wool-wich; and he proved that the London clay was not to be correlated, as previously supposed, with the Barton and Bracklesham beds. Nor did he limit his researches to this island. As a lad he had been at school in Paris; as a man of business he had frequent occasion to visit France; and as a geologist he came ultimately to be almost as familiar with the Tertiaries of France as with those of England, and was thus enabled to correlate the strata of the two countries. It was in the valley of the Somme that Sir Joseph Prestwich, in company with his friend Sir John Evans, was able, in 1859, to prove beyond cavil that the relics of human workmanship found in the older valley-deposits were contemporaneous with many of the extinct mammalia of the Pleistocene period. Anthropology has therefore the privilege of joining with Geology in grateful appreciation of the labours of Sir Joseph Prestwich.

Economic geology, not less than pure science, engaged his attention, and he became recognised as a high authority on questions of water supply and submarine engineering. In the Report of the Royal Coal Commission, on which he served, he discussed at great length the probability of finding coal under the newer rocks in the south of England; and, following Godwin-Austen, was led to take a very favourable view of this question.

In 1874, two years after his retirement from business, Prestwich was appointed to the chair of geology at Oxford, as successor to Prof. Phillips. The inaugural discourse, delivered by Prof. Prestwich on January 25, 1875, dealing with the Past and Future of Geology, disclosed his attitude towards some of the great problems of geological philosophy; and this was further exposed in his valuable treatise on geology which some years later issued from the Clarendon Press. Prestwich was never a strict adherent to the philosophy of Hutton and Lyell.

In recognition of Sir Joseph Prestwich's remarkable contributions to science, medals were at various times awarded to him by the Royal Society, the Geological Society, and the Institution of Civil Engineers; while the Académie des Sciences elected him a corresponding member. Indebted but little to early scientific training, his position in science was due almost entirely to natural gifts—his powers of accurate observation, acute reasoning, and lucid exposition in writing. Considering the exacting requirements of modern geology, with every branch becoming more and more highly specialised, it may be doubted whether such a man as Sir Joseph Prestwich will be a possibility in the future.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ASSYRIAN AND BABYLONIAN SUGGESTIONS FOR HEBREW ETYMOLOGIES.

ROCHESTER: JUNE 21, 1896.

Mr. Buchanan Gray has taken up Dr. Winckler's suggestion relative to the origin of the proper name Ebal, and given it an elaborate justification. Suggestions like this have, indeed, been made before. Even ten or fifteen years ago, to explain Ashbel as "man of Bel" and Ashhur as "men of Horus" was reasonable. Now, however, in the new light recently thrown on the relations between Babylon and Egypt on the one hand, and Syria and Palestine on the other, this acquires a still greater cogency. Mr. Gray goes beyond Dr. Winckler, who only supposes the name of Ebal the Horite to be compounded with the Babylonian divine name Bel. He ventures on the conjecture that Ebal, the name of the "mountain of cursing," contains the same divine name. This cannot at present be proved, but is plausible. Ebal and Gerizim must both, it would seem, have been sacred mountains; and just as Mount Hor seems to have been called Tur-Baal ("rock of Baal"), and a famous Moabite mountain is even called Mountain of Nebo, so it would be very natural to hear that a great central mountain bore the name mountain or rock of Bel. I understand Mr. Gray to wish for another case of a name presumably compounded with Bel in which the LXX. has preserved the e-vowel of -bel. Is there not one in Num.

xxxiv. 11, where for הַרְבֵּלָה we should, of course, read הַרְבֵּלָה; and, where the true reading of the LXX. is Ἀρβηλα? Harbel is identified by Furrer (in Riehm's Handwörterbuch) with one of the spurs of Hermon now called 'Arbel. This may or may not be correct; but, at any rate, Harbel very probably means "mountain of Bel." I agree with Mr. Gray as to the uncertainty of the etymology of Balaam: we have to consider not only Balaam, but the name Bela, of which Balaam may be a lengthened form.

As to the element 'V, I can only add a few other names which have to be considered—namely, the lim and Ijon of A.V., and also the place-name and tribe-name Avvim. In Josh. xv. 29 LXX. A. reads "Avvim" for "Iim." Though lim and Avvim must have suggested a meaning to Israelitish races, it does not follow that that meaning was a correct one. Even the name Avvim in Deut. ii. 23 may possibly have had a traditional basis, though the other non-historic names in the paragraph do not exactly confirm this view. As to 'V, the name of the city called in A.V. Ai, it is a great difficulty; nor can I feel sure that it was the original name of the city, or, if it was, that the initial 'V is rightly regarded as the article. It would be a help if we could identify Ebal plausibly with some name in the Karnak lists of Thothmes III. and Rameses II.

I should like to add a word of thanks to Mr. Paul Ruben for his suggestion in the ACADEMY of March 7, 1896, as to a word in a difficult, and, indeed, untranslatable, passage in Nahum (ii. 8). For חַעֲרֵלָה he proposes חַעֲרֵלָה, "the Lady," comparing Delitzsch's explanation of Ass. etellu, fem. etellitu, "great, exalted," used especially of gods and kings. I think that, with a little further emendation, a very tolerable half-verse would be produced. It appears to me that this gives the true etymology of חַעֲרֵלָה, "Athaliah," "Yahweh is great," or "is lord." I hardly venture to compare the Arabic 'atila, "to be copious."

SCIENCE NOTES.

MESSRS. FREDERICK WARNE & Co. announce Favourite Flowers of Garden and Greenhouse, to be published in weekly parts. The editor is Mr. E. Step, author of "Wayside and Woodland Blossoms"—of which a second series is just ready for issue—who has been assisted by Mr. W. Watson, of Kew. The work will be illustrated with 316 coloured plates, which have been specially drawn from the living plants.

MESSRS. TAYLOR BROS., of Leeds, have in the press a second edition of The Collector's Manual of British Land and Freshwater Shells, by Mr. Lionel Ernest Adams, hon. treasurer of the Conchological Society, with illustrations by Mr. G. W. Adams, Mr. Alfred Sich, and the author. The object of this work is to enable the novice to collect, identify, and arrange systematically the various slugs and land and freshwater shells of the British Isles, and their varieties. To facilitate identification, synoptical tables have been prepared, showing the differences in allied species of the Arions, Vertigos, Hyalinæ, and Pisidia, and also a table showing the generic distinctions of the Arionidae and Limacidae. All the technical terms are explained, and the classical names translated and accented in a glossary. A special plate has been collotyped from an enlarged photograph of the four small Pisidia, showing the differences in the outlines of typical specimens. There is also an original table of all the plain band combinations of the pentasteniate Helices.

THE Council of the Society of Arts are prepared to award, under the terms of the Benjamin Shaw Trust, a gold medal or a money prize of £20,

"For any discovery, invention, or newly devised method for obviating or materially diminishing any risk to life, limb, or health, incidental to any industrial occupation, and not previously capable of being so obviated or diminished by any known and practically available means."

THE following have been elected honorary corresponding members of the Royal Geographical Society: M. P. de Semenov, of St. Petersburg; Prof. K. Von den Steinen, of Berlin; Prof. G. Neumayer, of Hamburg; Prof. A. de Lapparent, of Paris; Prof. A. Penck, of Vienna; Prof. O. Pettersson, of Stockholm; Prof. C. M. Kan, of Amsterdam; Senhor E. do Canto, of the Azores; and Prof. H. Pittier, of Costa Rica.

THE late William Chandless has bequeathed a legacy of £500 to the Royal Geographical Society, of which he was a gold medallist.

A COMMITTEE has been formed at Liverpool for the establishment of a zoological garden, on a scientific basis, and on the model of that in London.

DR. WILLIAM COLLINGRIDGE, medical officer of the port of London, has been appointed Milroy Lecturer for 1897 by the Royal College of Physicians.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. JAMES PARKER & Co., of Oxford, will be the publishers of the new Frisian Dictionary, which has been in preparation for some years past under the authority of the provincial states of Friesland. Some part of the material, indeed, was collected by Halbertsma, in the beginning of the century; but the present editors are Waling Dijkstra and Dr. F. Beutenrust Hetteema. The scope of the work covers all the dialects spoken in Dutch Friesland, from the beginning of the seventeenth century down to the present time. The method adopted is to give: (1) the pronunciation of each word, with its dialectal variations; (2) its meaning in Latin, or (if more suitable) in English, as being the language nearest akin to Frisian—sometimes also in German or French, with a further description in Dutch; (3) the etymology, when it throws light upon the meaning; (4) the chief tenses of a verb and their dialectal variations; (5) full quotations, to which the greatest possible attention has been paid. In addition, there will be an Onomastikon, compiled by J. Winkler, comprising Christian names and names relating to the mythology, history, geography, and topography of Friesland, including Old and Middle Friesland nomenclature. The mode of publication is in twenty-five parts, at 2s. each, of which it is intended that five shall appear every year. The work is being printed at Leeuwarden, in Holland.

IN a series entitled El delincuente Español (Madrid: Suarez), Rafael Salillas writes on the language of criminals, attempting a psychological as well as a philological study of their slang or jargon. The volume has two vocabularies, one of Germania, or thieves' slang, the other of Caló Jergal, or slang derived from the Gypsy; the work is thus of interest equally to the sociologist and to the philologist.

REPORTS OF SOCIETIES.

HELLENIC.—(Annual Meeting, Monday, June 15.)

SIR E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, vice-president, in the chair.—The chairman expressed regret at the absence, from what he learnt was somewhat serious indisposition, of Prof. Jebb, the president of the society, who was to have taken the chair.—Mr. G. A. Macmillan (hon. secretary) read the council's report, in the course of which it was said: The council have again to report a season of useful work and steady prosperity, without any very striking incident. The publication of the Journal of Hellenic Studies is still the main outcome of the society's efforts, and, under the able guidance of the editorial committee, maintains an honourable place among periodicals of its class. The society has to regret the loss of some important members by death; and special mention is due to Lord Leighton, who had from the outset shown a warm interest in the society's work, and to Dr. Henry Middleton, who died a few days ago, and who was one of the earliest members of the society. Members will be glad to learn that the British School at Athens, to which the society has long been a subscriber, has now been placed upon a more satisfactory financial basis, and has done some excellent work during the past season. The number of well-equipped students has been fully up to the average, and important excavations have been carried on in the island of Melos, and for the first time in Athens itself, on the supposed site of the ancient Kynosarges. A full account of the results will, as usual, be given next month to the annual meeting of subscribers to the School. The council have in the course of the year voted grants of £50 to Mr. W. R. Paton towards some proposed excavations in the neighbourhood of Budrum, and of £30 to Mr. W. J. Woodhouse, a former student of the British School at Athens, towards additional illustrations for a work on the topography of Aetolia, which is to be published by the delegates of the Clarendon Press. The council have during the last few months devoted special attention to the library, with a view to improving the arrangements for its custody and management. New bookshelves have been provided, and the books are being rearranged in a more systematic way. Dr. Holden, to whom the society is much indebted for his valuable services as hon. librarian, has felt obliged to resign the post on account of ill-health; but the council have been fortunate enough to secure in his place the help of Mr. Arthur Smith, of the British Museum, who has long been an active member of the library committee. Miss Hughes, the assistant librarian, has also resigned her post, the increasing pressure of her duties for the Royal Asiatic Society rendering it impossible for her to give sufficient attention to the care of a second library. In her stead the council have appointed Miss Fanny Johnson, formerly head mistress of the Bolton High School for Girls, who is at present giving the whole of her time to the work. At the same time, as the funds available for the purchase of books are not large, it has been thought well to send to members during the past week a circular appealing for donations of suitable books or pamphlets. The treasurer's accounts show ordinary receipts during the year of £915 (if we include £30 refunded by Mr. Hogarth out of the grant of £100 made last year for excavations in Alexandria), against £910 during the financial year 1894-95. The receipts from subscriptions, including arrears, amount to £717, against £692; the receipts from life compositions amount to £63, against £50; and receipts from libraries and for the purchase of back volumes to £117, against £122, a decrease of £5. Receipts from other sources of ordinary income show no material alteration. Since the entrance fee was imposed in January, 1894, about £75 has been received from this source, a very substantial addition to the society's income. In the matter of ordinary expenditure, amounting to £621, against £730 in the previous year, the stationery, printing, and postage account is £46. The expenditure on the library has been £39, against £96 in the preceding year. The cost of the Journal, vol. xv., parts i. and ii., has amounted to £394. The annual grant of £100 to the British School at Athens has been made; and a balance was carried forward at the end of the financial year of £339 16s. 11d., against £169 7s. 6d. at the close of the preceding year. Twenty-four new members have been elected during the year, while thirty-six have been lost by death or resignation. This shows a net decrease of twelve, and brings the total number of members to 772. Ten new libraries have joined the list of subscribers, which now amount to 127, or, with the five public libraries, to 132.—The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that Lord Leighton would be especially missed in his capacity of trustee of the British Museum, where in matters of art his advice was almost implicitly taken. Other losses in the course of the year were Sir William Stewart, once Minister at Athens, and Lord Bath, a trustee of the British Museum. The death of Dr. Middleton was a serious loss to art, for he was a man of wide culture and extensive knowledge not only of ancient but also of medieval art. With a membership of 772, the society had no occasion for anxiety at a small temporary decline in numbers.—Prof. Butler, in seconding the motion, observed that, wherever there was a vigorous intellectual life, there was an increase of Hellenic study, which might be taken as the measure and mark of advancement in other departments of knowledge.—The report was adopted.—Mr. Cecil Smith, in a short account of archaeological research during the past year, said that the most important result was the discovery by the French at Delphi of a singularly beautiful piece of sculpture of the date of Hieron of Syracuse. The work represented a quadriga, and there was a figure of a youth in an almost perfect state with the eyes clearly marked. The French had also done admirable work in the department of Byzantine art; the Germans had been engaged at Priene; the Austrians at Ephesus; and a young American student, at considerable risk, had obtained an interesting inscription from the Parthenon of the date of about 60 A.D.

ZOOLOGICAL.—(Tuesday, June 16.)

SIR WILLIAM H. FLOWERS, president, in the chair.—Mr. Solater (secretary) exhibited and made remarks on a coloured drawing of the gun of Nyasaland, taken by Mr. Caldwell from the specimen transmitted to the British Museum by Sir H. H. Johnston, and exhibited by Mr. Solater at a former meeting. The specimen seemed to be referable to a new local form of the brindled gun, which Mr. Solater proposed to name Connochoetes taurinus johnstoni.—Mr. Holding exhibited and made remarks on various abnormal horns and antlers of the Caucasian wild goat and of two species of deer.—Mr. E. E. Austen gave an account of a journey undertaken by Mr. F. O. Pickard-Cambridge and he author up the Lower Amazons, on board Messrs. Siemen Bros. Cable ss. Paraday, for the purpose of making zoological collections on behalf of the British Museum. No terrestrial mammals were met with; but observations were made on the two species of fresh water dolphins (Inia geoffroyensis and Sotalia tucuxi, or S. fluviatilis), which are extremely abundant in the Lower Amazons. Among the birds, the only species of special interest collected were a little goatsucker from Manaus, referred provisionally to Nyctiprogne leucopygia, and a woodpecker (Celeus ochraceus), of which the British Museum previously possessed but two specimens. The reptiles and amphibians met with all belonged to well-known and widely distributed forms, and the chief interest of the collections centred in the invertebrates. Among these Mr. Pickard-Cambridge made a large collection of spiders, including an extensive series of the large hairy Theraphosidae, eleven species of which were pronounced to be new. An interesting collection of the nests of some of these forms was also obtained. Mr. Cambridge likewise secured several specimens of Peripatus. Mr. Austen, who devoted himself chiefly to insects, obtained some 2500 specimens of different orders, of which it was expected that a fair proportion would prove to be new. Attention was drawn to some interesting examples of mimicry.—Mr. P. Chalmers Mitchell read a "Contribution to the Anatomy of the Hoatzin (Opisthocomus cristatus). He stated that from the characters of the alimentary canal, the hoatzin might be placed either between the sandgrouse and the pigeons, or between the Gallinae and the Cuculidae. He described some interesting individual variations in the condition of the ambiens muscle, and referred to other points in muscular anatomy.—Mr. G. A. Boulenger gave an account of the occurrence of Tomistoma schlegli in the Malay Peninsula, and added some remarks on the atlas and axis of the Crocodillians.—A communication was read from Mr. W. Sohaus, containing notes on Walker's American types of Lepidoptera in the University Museum, Oxford.—Mr. Hamilton H. Druce read a paper entitled "Further Contributions to our Knowledge of the Bornean Lycenidae," in which he referred to about forty species of this family not hitherto recorded from Borneo. A number of these were new, and were now described by Mr. G. T. Bethune Baker and the author.—Dr. J. Anderson communicated, on behalf of Miss M. E. Durham, some notes on the mode of swallowing eggs adopted by a South African snake (Dasyatis scabra) as observed in the specimens now living in the society's Gardens, and illustrated by a series of drawings.

METEOROLOGICAL.—(Wednesday, June 17.)

E. MAWLEY, Esq., president, in the chair.—Mr. H. Harries read a paper on "Arctic Hail and Thunderstorms," in which he showed that the commonly accepted opinion that hail and thunderstorms are almost, if not quite, unknown in the arctic regions is incorrect. He had examined one hundred logs of vessels which had visited the arctic regions, and found that out of that number no fewer than seventy-three showed that hail was experienced at some time or other. Thunderstorms were not so frequent as hail, but they have been observed in seven months out of the twelve, the month of greatest frequency being August. Mr. Harries is of opinion that the breeding-places of thunderstorms in these high latitudes is in the neighbourhood of Barent's Sea.—A paper by Mr. J. E. Oullum on "The Climatology of Valencia Island" was also read. The observatory at Valencia, which is under the control of the Meteorological Office, is situated on the extreme south-west coast of Ireland, and is almost the most westerly point of Europe. Continuous records from self-recording instruments were carried on from 1869 until 1891, when the observatory was removed to Cahirciveen; and the author gives the results of the observations for these twenty-three years.

FINE ART.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

IV.

PLACED in the great courtyard of Burlington House, the important equestrian statue, "Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, V.C." by Mr. Harry Bates, of which the original in bronze and stone is destined to be erected at Calcutta, imperatively claims the notice of the visitor on the threshold of the Royal Academy. Following the example set by Mr. Onslow Ford, Mr. Bates adopts a modification of the high, narrow Venetian pedestal designed by Alessandro Leopardi for Verrocchio's great equestrian figure of the condottiere Bartolommeo Colleoni. The big work makes a brave show on a first introduction, with the martial figure of the English general mounted on a charger which he has suddenly brought to a standstill, and the bronze statues of Victory on the one side of the pedestal and of a vanquished Afghan warrior on the other. Yet it will not bear a close analysis: its parts are not really in a close and coherent relation to each other. The figure of Lord Roberts himself requires bolder and less portrait-like treatment to go with its surroundings, and to stand at the altitude at which it is now placed; the frieze, with a succession of Oriental battle scenes, is stiff and lifeless with all its pretensions to modernity, and withal not decorative enough in general effect to atone for such defects. The best portion of the ensemble is the bronze figure of the Afghan warrior, strong and lithe in his semi-nudity—a vanquished, but not a crushed or humiliated foe.

Two busts by the same artist, "Colonel G. H. Trevor" and "The Marquess of Lansdowne"—both of them in white marble tinted to the tone of ivory—are happily characterised, if a little wanting in accent. In the one and the other a very striking and legitimate use, for purposes of expression, is made of light and shade. Fortunately, the employment in portrait and other sculpture of unstained white marble of the "sugar-loaf" order—a mode which we may now assume to have been unknown to the Greeks of the greatest periods of art—is rapidly becoming a thing of the past.

A bust, and a very remarkable one, is the chief contribution of Mr. Alfred Gilbert to the display in the Lecture Room. This represents the late Sir Richard Owen in the act of examining through a magnifying glass what we may assume to be a fossil bone. So momentary, so entirely pictorial is the conception, that the work might more properly be styled a half-length in the round than a bust. The modelling, which in its realistic treatment of surface-detail suggests the clay, and will not without some diminution of vitality suffer translation into marble, is of its kind superb. This selection for presentment of one special moment, though a typical one, in the life of a great man of science, whose life-work suggests permanency as well as advance, is open to question. It is diametrically opposed to that of the great portrait-sculptor Houdon, for instance, who, from Voltaire and Rousseau to Napoleon I., modelled the features of more notabilities in literature, art, war, and politics than any man of his time.

Exquisitely wrought, if too nearly smothered in its wealth of decorative splendour, is Mr. Gilbert's statuette, in aluminium and painted ivory, "St. George." The beautifully fashioned armour of the warrior saint has a luxuriance of contourné design suggesting now the extravagance of the fifteenth century gothic, now that of the rococo. Yet its style is not precisely to be resolved into either the one or the other, since as a whole it belongs to Mr. Gilbert himself.

Mr. Onslow Ford is this year represented only by busts—those of Mr. Alma Tadema and Mr. George Henschel. In both, but much more markedly in the former, he shows that he can combine with the most felicitous characterisation a decorative mode of treatment, such as the French sculptors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries adopted with never-failing effect. The "Alma-Tadema" is an admirable performance, giving without any undue departure from sculptural treatment the peculiar joie de vivre which characterises the outer aspect of the famous Anglo-Dutch painter.

Mr. George Frampton is as restless as the bee, buzzing about from one flower to another; though not exactly an imitator of any one style, he is pre-eminently an eclectic. In his "Panel for a Door—Seven Heroines out of 'Mort d'Arthur,'" he forgets for the moment his leanings towards the Florentine Quattrocento realism on the one hand, and modern French symbolistic art on the other. Not unnaturally, seeing what his subject is, he appears here under the influence of English pre-Raphaelism as it has been developed under the leadership of Sir E. Burne-Jones. More finely modelled, and more true to the art of high-relief, is Mr. W. Reynolds Stephens's not dissimilar panel, with a single figure, called "Happy in Beauty, Life, and Love."

Besides the realisation in bronze of his life-size academic study, "A Boy at Play," exhibited last year at Burlington House, Mr. W. Goscombe John brings forward a relief, "The Glamour of the Rose," which is assuredly below the level to which he has accustomed us. Lightness and yet security of poise, with a delicate suggestion of impending upward flight, are the qualities which chiefly distinguish Signor Andrea Lucchesi's full-length statue, "The Flight of Fancy." Mr. Gustave Natorp's wholly undraped bronze figure "Atalanta" shows qualities of both boldness and subtlety in the treatment of the nude which are still anything but common in English art. The formidable difficulties inherent in the conception—the moment chosen being that in which the fair, unconquered runner stoops a moment to pick up the precious fruit—are successfully and at the same time agreeably overcome.

It would have been franker on the part of Mr. Hibbert Binney to acknowledge his obligations to a famous fifteenth-century bust of a young girl in the Louvre, formerly deemed to be of Florentine origin, but now tentatively put down to a Neapolitan sculptor. His bronzed bust, "La Penserosa," is, in truth, but a modernised variation of that work, or of one among its tolerably numerous fellows. The marble bust of the popular singer Mme. Emma Calvé, in the part of Santuzza, which Countess Feodora Gleichen has executed for the Queen, is a happy realisation not less of the dramatic artist's own striking individuality, than of that of the hapless Sicilian peasant girl whom in "Cavalleria Rusticana" she impersonates with so passionate a truth. The three naked youths in Mr. J. M. Swynnerton's "Group representing Upper Portion of a Fountain" are capably modelled and harmoniously interlaced. He has here beyond doubt been inspired by Carpeaux's great fountain near the Observatoire in Paris, with the nude figures of women representing the four quarters of the globe.

The modern French school of medallists, headed by those great artists, M. Chaplain and M. Roty, has, it would appear, created an offshoot in England. As a rule, however, the execution of our craftsmen, who have derived inspiration from these sources, and in a measure also from Pisanello and the Italian medallists of the Quattrocento, is so tentative and insufficient that a detailed examination of their work appears uncalled for. As exceptions may be mentioned, a "Portrait-Medal—Sir Joseph Prestwich," by Miss Lydia Gay, and a "Case of Medals," by Mr. Frank Bowcher. These last are finely finished, with an excess, if anything, of chasing, but they reveal a much too slavish imitation of M. Roty's manner, which extends even to the form and arrangement of the medals and plaques.

The purely decorative work, other than that of Mr. Gilbert himself, is remarkable rather for effort in the direction of novelty than for thoroughness and perfection of finish. It will suffice to refer to Mr. Bertram Mackennal's "Centre Piece for Dining-table-Silver"; to Mr. Gustave Natorp's somewhat heavy, yet all the same imposing, "Regatta Cup"; to the "Door-panels" of Mr. Gilbert Boyes, which are full of the spirit and the imprévu of Japanese art, but too much lack definiteness of modelling; to the "Book-cover" of Miss Lillian Simpson, the "Casket-Silver and Enamel" of Mr. Nelson and Miss Edith Dawson; and the ivory medallion, "Phoebe and Endymion," of Mr. Clovis Delacour.

CLAUDE PHILLIPS.

TWO MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

MR. J. J. SHANNON's pictures at the Fine Art Society's ought not to be missed. Not only do they display, in a degree that had not been expected, the versatility of his talent and the flexibility of his brush; but they fittingly remind us of Mr. Shannon's charm of colour and design. Several of the canvases afford conclusive proof of his comparatively recent mastery of open-air light and colour. Thus, "In the Springtime" is a genre picture—a picture of two modern lovers—exquisite in illumination and hue. "The Squirrel" is but half a portrait, in the wholly favourable sense, however, that it represents only a momentary phase of the delightful little model—the energetic and resolute yet sweet little blonde who has the squirrel on her shoulder—but, in recording that phase or mood, reveals likewise something of permanent character. Of professed and stated portraits there are a certain number in Mr. Shannon's exhibition, and all are interesting; but the principal point about them is that they show not only original talent, but continuous and marked progress. Mr. Shannon's portraits are full of pictorial quality; and "character," though not too obviously sought for, is often subtly observed. There is hardly another painter of the day who enters more heartily into the enjoyment of modern types, or who is able better to grapple with the record of the charm—conventional people always speak of it as the "difficulty"—of modern costume.

GERMAN and Swiss original etching has not, and does not deserve to have, the rank assigned to it by the expert that may be claimed fairly by the best French and English; yet are we indebted to Mr. R. Gutkunst for the opportunity he is now giving us for seeing at his rooms in King-street, St. James's, some of the more considerable recent work. In the department of landscape there is not much, it may be, which the amateur will admire heartily. The German and Swiss etcher has sometimes much skill in the indication of foliage, but little perception of ensemble, or of the charm of atmosphere and vista. Some of the figure-pieces are vastly better. By Stauffer, a young Bernese artist who, like the master etcher of the last generation—Méryon, of course—departed this life in a madhouse, there is an extremely vigorous and finely modelled portrait of a brother artist, one Peter Halm, with whose name and work it is possible we ought to be acquainted. His face, as Stauffer has engraved it, is full of character and quiet purpose. Another excellent Stauffer is a rightly elaborate study of a young model lying on her stomach, with head turned to the spectator. This is really an important and rare achievement in the etching of the nude figure. Koepping's nudity, though spirited in pose or action, is very inferior to Stauffer's, since it is extremely ill-drawn—at all events, the lower part of it. But the same artist's "Reverie" is effective; its handling, extremely dexterous. The symbolism of Max Klinger is for the most part either too naive or too unintelligible to appeal to us; but the technique of this artist—often very varied in method—is, in its result, almost uniformly successful.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

At a representative meeting held on Monday at Marlborough House, with the Prince of Wales in the chair, it was unanimously resolved:

"That a memorial to the late Lord Leighton of Stretton, President of the Royal Academy, be erected in St. Paul's, and that a subscription list be opened for that purpose."

Mr. Val. C. Prinsep and Mr. S. Pepys Cockerell were appointed joint hon. secretaries; and Lord Hillingdon was appointed treasurer.

THE Treasury have increased the annual grant to the British Museum for purchases and acquisitions by £6000, with special reference to the sales of coins that have recently taken place. We may add that the Greek cabinet of the late Sir E. H. Bunbury has realised altogether £8700.

SIR EDWARD BURNE-JONES has undertaken to design a series of paintings for the reredos to be placed in Christ Church, Woburn-square, as a memorial to the late Christina Rossetti. Donations to the fund for this purpose may be sent to the Bank of England. Among those who have already subscribed are Mr. W. M. Rossetti, Mr. A. C. Swinburne, and Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton.

RATHBONE's fine work on Old Wedgwood, which has been much delayed in publication through the bankruptcy of the printers in Paris, is now fairly on its way to completion. Mr. Quaritch, having secured the services of Mr. Griggs, of Peckham, for the production of the plates, will issue the fifth part next week, and the remaining three parts will follow shortly.

THE Guild and School of Handicraft, Essex House, Bow, will publish next week a monograph, by Mr. C. R. Ashbee, on the Trinity Hospital at Mile End. The book is richly illustrated with lithographs, architectural and line drawings, and a complete set of plans of the Wren portion of the buildings. It is issued under the auspices of the committee for the Survey of the Old Memorials of Greater London, and the illustrations are by various members of the committee.

At the meeting of the Royal Archaeological Institute, to be held in Hanover-square on Wednesday next, Prof. B. Lewis will read a paper on "The Mosaic of Monnus at Trèves."

THERE will open next week—at The Sign of the Dial, Warwick-street—an exhibition of forty designs by the late Arthur Boyd Houghton, including some original drawings and proofs re-touched by the artist.

At the meeting of the Royal Institute of British Architects, held on Monday, Prof. Aitchison, the new president, was inducted into the chair, and presented the Royal gold medal to Mr. Ernest George.

ON Monday next, Messrs. Sotheby begin the sale—which will last altogether for ten days—of the second and final portion of the numismatic collection formed by the late William Boyne, author of Tokens of the Seventeenth Century. This portion consists of the foreign coins and medals, in no less than 1800 lots. The compiler of the catalogue, who has (as usual) done his work most thoroughly, calls special attention to the earlier coins in the French series (of the Merovingian and Carolingian periods), to the very fine German and Austrian thalers, to issues of the several Swiss cantons, and to the Italian collection. Of the last he says that none so complete has ever before been offered for sale in England.

MR. HAMO THORNYCROFT's statue of the Queen, which is now in the quadrangle of the Royal Exchange, is, unlike Mr. Alfred Gilbert's famous statue at Winchester, a standing, not a seated, figure. After the fashion of the day, it is, in a measure, symbolical; for while in her right hand Her Majesty holds and wields an earthly sceptre, she bears in her left a little globe, symbolical of the extent of her empire, with a little winged Victory poised upon it. Mr. Thornycroft has represented the Queen in some approach to youth—following in this respect rather the precedent of the Princess Louise's charming statue in Kensington Gardens than the statue by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, which represents with regal magnificence the Queen in her most mature hours. When looked at from behind, the Queen's draperies, which fall in heavy folds about her feet, specially court attention. They are managed with extreme skill; nor is there, indeed, any point of importance—whether it be "composition," bearing, or faint likeness—that the statue misses. It is not, probably, so great a work of art as that statue at Winchester to which we have already referred, but it is in every way an agreeable and welcome presentation of the illustrious and revered lady who is its subject.

OF the collection of Impressionist pictures bequeathed to the French Government by the late Gustave Caillebotte, forty have been accepted by the keeper of the Luxembourg, where they will be placed in a new gallery, to be built on the garden terrace. They include eight examples of Monet, eight of Pissarro, six of Renoir, six of Sisley, two of Manet, seven pastels of Degas, and two drawings of Millet.

THE Prix Duchalais has been awarded to M. de la Tour, librarian of the coin-cabinet at the Bibliothèque Nationale, for four memoirs on Italian medals of the Renaissance.

THE STAGE.

THE old and the new schools of acting appear to be singularly mingled in the representation of "The School for Scandal," under the Forbes Robertson and Harrison management, temporarily installed at the Lyceum. For while the controllers of the enterprise have secured for the character of Sir Peter Teazle the best, soundest, most picturesque Sir Peter that this generation has seen—we speak, of course, of Mr. William Farren—they have two or three minor characters (to say the least) played most inadequately and inappropriately, with all the easy, yet ineffective, self-confidence of the up-to-date dabbler with classic things. And, in more important parts, there is Mr. Forbes Robertson (neither quite of the older nor quite of the newer school) playing Joseph Surface; and Mrs. P. Campbell charming certain people out of their senses by a Lady Teazle that has little spontaneity, little naïveté, and little youth. The performance is apparently somewhat in the nature of a stop-gap. It would be rash, at all events, to predict a long run for it.

BY the death of Sir Augustus Harris—which happened on Monday, at Folkestone, whither he had betaken himself for a measure of rest—the English stage loses not a great artist, but a great manager, and one who must be accounted, in heart and in capacity, a big man. The energy of Sir Augustus was phenomenal, because it was ceaseless; and he managed thousands of people—at Drury Lane, at the Opera, at Olympia, in travelling companies both for Diana and for Pantomime—without sacrificing popularity among either these innumerable employes or the great public that enjoyed the exhibition of his lavish enterprise. Sir Augustus was not only a "good fellow," but a very remarkable business man; and we are glad to hear that he left his affairs in such order that there will, for the present at least, be little interruption in the execution of the schemes he had conceived. In the long run, of course, the theatrical profession and the ordinary public, for which it was his pride to cater well, will suffer—cannot help suffering—by Sir Augustus's premature demise.

MR. SWINBURNE has written some verses upon the occasion of the revival of Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus," by the Elizabethan Stage Society, which will be spoken before the commencement of the play on Thursday next. As this is the first dramatisation that was ever attempted of the German story, several members of German universities are coming to London in order to see the performance.

MUSIC.

OBITUARY.

SIR AUGUSTUS HARRIS.

Mors ultima linea rerum est—so wrote the old Roman poet; but some men reach that boundary line much sooner than others. Sir Augustus Harris has been removed while in the prime of life; and though of late he had not been in good health, the end came with extreme suddenness. He fixed the age beyond which he would not live at forty-six, but at the time of his death he was two years younger. Sir Augustus was an actor, author, theatrical manager, and opera impresario. Further, he was elected Sheriff in 1891, and soon afterwards became Deputy-Lieutenant of the City. Thus during his short career he played many parts; here, however, I am solely concerned with his operatic enterprises at Covent Garden and Drury Lane.

It would be easy to find fault with a man who tried to please everyone, and who, therefore, fully satisfied no one; such a course, however, would be irrational, and most certainly ungrateful. In this country, theatres and opera houses are not subsidised by State; and an impresario such as the late Sir Augustus found himself beset on all sides with serious difficulties and heavy responsibilities. It is, therefore, surprising that he was able to accomplish as much as he did, and his name should be held in grateful remembrance.

With regard to opera, he lived and laboured at a critical period. From the time of the production here, in 1870, of the "Flying Dutchman," Richard Wagner, then little more than a name, has gradually become a mighty force. Not only have his earlier works, "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," and also his "Meistersinger," achieved popularity; but indirectly he has influenced, to a greater or less degree, all composers writing for the stage. And in proportion as that influence has grown in strength, the prosperity of Italian opera of the old school has declined. The records of the seasons of twenty or thirty years ago must be studied by anyone desirous of understanding and fully appreciating the change that has gradually come over the opera. Sir Augustus, whatever may have been his early associations, was alive to the situation. He recognised the new power, and helped materially to establish the fame of the Bayreuth master. Yet he did not espouse the cause with the zeal of a propagandist or with the intolerance of some of the master's followers. Had he done so, his operatic enterprises would soon have suffered shipwreck. In this important matter he displayed tact and patience.

Sir Augustus also deserves to be remembered for the efforts which he made to produce at the earliest possible opportunity new foreign works by composers of importance. I need only mention such names as those of Massenet, Mascagni, Bruneau, and Verdi.

Sir Augustus had many friends. Success did not spoil him; and whatever sternness he may have had at times to exhibit in the discharge of his duties, he was agreeable in manner and considerate. My opportunities of seeing him were frequent; and I may truly say that to me he was always kind and courteous, and always had a pleasant word on his lips. The widespread sorrow caused by his death offers strong proof of the esteem and affection in which he was held.

RECENT CONCERTS.

MME. BLANCHE MARCHESI gave a vocal recital at the small Queen's Hall on Friday evening, June 19. Though her voice may not be very strong, she impressed by her breadth of tone, her pure intonation, and her intellectual readings. Her selection of music was exceedingly attractive; it included a Cantata by Marcello, songs by Schubert, an Aria by Bach, and some characteristic songs by modern French composers, among which we would specially note Charpentier's "Complainte." The vocal programme, in fact, was quite unhackneyed. Herr Heinrich Kiefer, as violoncellist, displayed his skill in various showy solos.

On Saturday afternoon Señor Sarasate gave his third and last concert. The programme included a new Sonata for violin and piano-forte by Saint-Saëns (Op. 102), recently performed for the first time at Paris by Señor Sarasate and the composer. The opening movement is effective; the subject-matter has character and charm, and it is developed not only in an able manner, but without any sense of effort. A sparkling Scherzo is followed by a dreamy, slow movement; and the work concludes with a Rondo, which is fresh and pleasing, though it shows the spirit of the past rather than the present. The Sonata, interpreted with intelligence and refinement by the violinist and Dr. Otto Neitzel, is one of Saint-Saëns' best contributions to chamber music. It contrasted most favourably with the same composer's "Concertstück" in A (Op. 20) for violin, the next piece on the programme; even the fine interpretation which this received failed to render it attractive. Dr. Otto Neitzel played solos by Chopin and Liszt, and was again warmly applauded. The concert commenced with Bach's third Sonata in E for violin and piano-forte.

Mme. Kate Lee gave an "Irish" concert at the small Queen's Hall on Monday evening. Her voice, though not of first-rate quality, is sympathetic, and she sings with expression and intelligence. The programme included many airs, arranged by Dr. V. Stanford and Mr. Fuller-Maitland and Lucy Broadwood. Miss Evangeline Florence and Mr. J. Sandbrook, the other vocalists, gave great satisfaction. Miss Ethel Sharpe (Mrs. A. Hobday) contributed piano-forte, Mlle. Sethe violin, and Mr. Herbert Walenn cello solos. In recording a successful concert, the excellent services rendered by the two accompanists, Mr. Henry Bird and Mr. H. J. Wood, must not be forgotten.

A "Recital" of Mascagni's latest work, "Zanetto," was given at 7, Chesterfield-gardens (by courtesy of Mrs. Beer) on Tuesday afternoon, by Signorine Giulia and Sofia Ravogli. This short lyric composition, consisting of only two scenes and occupying less than an hour in performance, contains music of great delicacy and charm. It was sung to piano-forte and harp accompaniment; and though these were effectively rendered by Signor V. Ricci and Mr. John Thomas, it will easily be understood that the music without orchestra cannot produce its full effect. The work is only suitable for a small theatre. It was produced last March, under the composer's direction, at the Liceo Musicale, Pesaro. The libretto, with certain condensations made for musical reasons, is merely an Italian version of Coppée's "Le Passant," first played at the Odéon, by Mmes. Agar and Sarah Bernhardt. The Signorine Ravogli interpreted their parts in a sympathetic manner.

THE EGYPTIAN QUESTION. EGYPT UNDER the BRITISH. By H. F. WOOD.

Crown 8vo, 4s.
The TIMES says: "Mr. Wood's book will be read with interest and profit by all who desire to understand the actual situation in Egypt.... It enjoys the advantage of appearing several years later and of recording in many cases more mature results than had been attained under British tutelage at the time when Sir Alfred Milner wrote."

T. P. O'CONNOR'S NEW BOOK.

NAPOLEON. By T. P. O'Connor, M.P.

Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]
Mr. O'Connor takes the Conqueror, Statesman, and Emperor chiefly in his social and domestic aspects, and regards him from the several points of view of friends, critics, and enemies, weighing all the evidence, and balancing each separate judgment with critical tolerance.

MAJOR-GENERAL ROBLEY'S WORK ON TATTOOING. MOKO; or, Maori Tattooing. By Major-General ROBLEY. With numerous Illustrations by the Author. Demy 4to, 42s. [Ready.]

The present book is divided into two sections. The first treats of the beautiful lines and curves used in tattooing by the Maori. The second section of the book is entitled "Moko-Mokai," and deals with the preserved heads of the Maoris. The book is one which owes its character to the completeness with which the subject is illustrated. The illustrations number over one hundred and fifty.

THE VEIL LIFTED: a New Light on the World's History. By H. MARTYN KENNARD. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 6s.

"The author has various theories which he supports with much argumentative force."—People.
